EMENDATIONS AND COMMENTS.

BEING advised that a new set of 500 sheets is going to the bindery, the author feels it his duty to point out a few mistakes which crept into the book, and to add some changes in and comments on the translation. While some of them incorporate a better afterthought, others (indeed most of them) are mere alternatives. Prof. Herbert Giles's Remains of Lao Tzu, and C. Spurgeon Medhurst's Tao Teh King, an Appreciation, have proved very suggestive and have been duly considered in the revision. We classify our comments under three heads:

1. Errata, being positive errors and misprints which slipped in by mistake.
2. Proposed emendations, being preferable readings of the text; and
3. Changes in the interpretation of the text implying new or alternative versions in the translation.

ERRATA.

In the Introductory:

Page 10, line 1 (also page 328, line 8) read बोधि for बुद्धि.

In the English Translation:

Changes in the Chinese Text.

Having revised my edition of the text together with the translation, on the basis of suggestions and criticisms given me by reviewers and correspondents,<sup>1</sup> I propose to adopt the following changes, mostly made on the authority of the 林希逸 and 沈一貫 editions, in the reading of the text:

Substitute in Chapter 49 the reading 得 teh "to obtain" for 德 teh "virtue," accordingly on page 76, line 3, characters 1 and 15, replace 得 for 德.

Page 222, second column, characters 10 and 24, read 得 teh, "Thus I obtain," for 德 teh, 872, "[For] virtue," which implies that in the following lines we should read:

Page 258, first column, character 18, read 衰 ngai, 619, "the sorrowing" for 衰 shwai, 785, "the weaker."

These corrections in the text involve the following changes in the translation:

The second paragraph of Chapter 49 on pages 121-122 should read:

"The good I meet with goodness; the bad I also meet with goodness. Thus I actualise goodness. The faithful I meet with faith; the faithless I also meet with faith. Thus I actualise faith."

The last paragraph of Chapter 69 on page 132 should read:

"Thus, if matched armies encounter one another, the one which does so in sorrow, is sure to conquer."

Changes in the Translation and Alternative Versions.

In reconsidering my translation I propose to make the following changes and suggest some alternative versions in the interpretation of the text :

CHAPTER 2.

First paragraph (pages 97-98), read :

"In the world all understand that if beauty makes a show of beauty, then it is only ugliness. When all understand that goodness makes a show of goodness, then it is only badness."

CHAPTER 3.

The first sentence (page 98, lines 18-20) had better be translated thus :

"Not priding oneself on one's worth forestalls the people's envy. Not prizing treasures that are difficult to obtain keeps people from committing theft."

CHAPTER 4.

The last word of the verses quoted in Chapter 4, 塵 ch'an, "dust," offers some difficulty and the traditional interpretation is embodied in the rendering given on page 99. I wish to state that Professor Giles offers another translation which recommends itself, if not to the Chinese commentators, yet to the taste of a modern reader as more elegant. Giles calls attention to the fact that the word ch'an means also "age," and he translates the sentence "Live in harmony with your age." But if we are permitted to break away from the traditional interpretation of the passage, it seems to me advisable to go one step further and translate "adapt thyself to the troubles," or "travails of the sense-world," for the word ch'an is frequently used in exactly this sense. With the Buddhists, it is a terminus technicus denoting the âyatana or sense-perceptions, involving the mortal coil that flesh is heir to. These twelve âyatana consist of the six sense-organs, viz., the eye, the ear, the nose, the tongue, the body, the mind, and the six analogous properties of reality, viz., form, sound, odor, taste, contact, ideas. The Buddhist term suggests the possibility that the word ch'an was used also in pre-Buddhistic times in the sense of "the dustiness of the world," viz., the limitations of sense-perceived objectivity, i. e., troubles, tribulation, travail. On this assumption we propose to let the four lines read as follows:

"It will blunt its own sharpness,
Will its tangles unravel;
It will dim its own radiance
And conform to its travail."<sup>1</sup>

CHAPTER 8.

Insert in Chapter 8, first paragraph, line 4, between the words "shun," and "therefore" the clause in brackets, for the sake of rendering the meaning more obvious: "[seeking a position of lowliness]."

CHAPTER 10.

The first paragraph (pages 101 and 159) is an old crux of translators. The word 魄 p'oh means the animal or sense-soul in contrast to reason. If the punctuation sign between characters 3 and 4 is cancelled, we might translate:

<sup>1</sup>The same lines are quoted in chapter 56, p. 125, where according to the context "it" should be replaced by "he," and "its" by "his."

"By sustaining discipline, the senses embrace unity and we (or one) can be without disintegration."

Professor Giles, following Huai Nan Tze, inserts the particle 乎 twice at the end of each sentence, which implies an exclamation or query. He translates the sentence thus:<sup>1</sup>

"That soul and body which are now one,— can they not be separated?

By the utmost exertion to become gentle,— can one become as gentle as a child?"

Huai Nan Tze's version agrees otherwise with the traditional text. But Professor Giles translates as if the word 魂 hwun=rational soul had been substituted for 營 ying=discipline—a reading suggested by some commentators and accepted as preferable by M. Julien.

It is not commendable to heap emendations and interpolations; but if we do so, we would on the basis of a combination of Huai Nan Tze's reading and the emendation of M. Julien prefer the following translation to that offered by Professor Giles:

"Will not the quickening spirit and the sense-soul, although they now form a unity, [finally] be disintegrated? Could we, by concentrating our vitality and becoming gentle, be turned into babes? (Answer: No!) [But] by purification, by cleansing, and by profound insight, we can free ourselves from faults."

This translation is possible, but not probable, and would scarcely have been countenanced by the ancient native commentators.

CHAPTER 14.

Professor Giles reads (Chap. 14, IV., character 19) 物 for 象.<sup>1</sup> The variant is unessential but speaks in favor of my translation. The sentence, as the Tao Teh King has it, reads: 無象之象無狀之狀, which means "of the formless the form, of the imageless the image"—in Kantian terminology, "the purely formal": viz., the form of that which is without bodily form.

Professor Giles, following Lieh Tze, reads:

無狀之狀 無物之象.

He translates:

"The likeness of things unseen: the form of that which is without body."

Lieh Tze's reading strengthens my interpretation of the passage, for Lieh Tze replaces the word image by being. The word 物 wuh means "a thing, a body, a creature," viz., any concrete particular object in the world, and the term 10,000 wuh, the myriad things, means the universe, as the sum total of all existences. That kind of form which has nothing to do with the concrete forms of material objects is Kant's "thought, form" (Gedankenwesen) or "noumenon." That such is Lao-Tze's and his commentators', meaning of the phrase appears from the explanation offered according to Professor Giles by both Han Fei Tze and Huai Nan Tze. Professor Giles makes the following summary:

"A live elephant has rarely been seen; nevertheless, by putting together the bones of a dead elephant, one can get an idea of the living animal. [Hence the word elephant came to have the meaning of image.] So, the way [viz., the Tao] cannot be either heard or seen; but sages, by observing its influence, can infer its semblance."

There is no reason to change either the reading of the traditional text or the version of my translation on account of Professor Giles's reference to Han Fei Tze.

CHAPTER 15.

The last sentence of this chapter had better be translated:

"Without reform he is perfect."

CHAPTER 16.

The beginning of Chapter 16 would perhaps be better understood by reading:

"By attaining vacuity's completion, we guard our tranquillity truthfully."

Professor Giles translates less literally and in too modern a form:

"Without distraction quietly concentrate yourself."

This is not exactly what Lao-Tze said but what perhaps a Western moralist would say in explanation of Lao-Tze's sentence. "Vacuity," 虛 hsü, means an emptiness of all distracting thoughts, and "tranquillity," 靜 tsing, implies composure as well as "concentration."

CHAPTER 20.

The two sentences of the second paragraph of Chapter 20 perhaps are to be interpreted as one sentence which then must be read thus:

"If what the people dread cannot be made dreadful, there will be desolation, alas! and verily, there will be no end of it."

Professor Giles translates:

"What the people reverence cannot be treated with disrespect."

The passage seems to mean that the people ought to be taught to be comforted as to the evils of life, poverty, disease, and death; but it might as well mean:

"What the people dread should not be dreadful, [But the death penalty has become so common that it no longer inspires dread. The result is a condition of lawlessness.] How great is the desolation! Alas! it has not as yet reached its limit."

The significance of the passage remains, as that of so many other sentences of the Tao-Teh-King, an open question.

CHAPTER 21.

The word 甫 fu (Chapter 21, I., 49) means "any thing foremost." Accordingly it is translated "beginning," and then "Lordship" or "Excellency." The latter seems to be more appropriate in the present case, where 德 the teh (or virtue) of the Tao is praised. We propose to replace the end of the chapter thus:

"Its name is never vanishing,
It sees the good of everything.

"Whereby do I know that for the good of everything it thus behaves? By this same Reason."

CHAPTER 22.

Perhaps the first two sentences are smoother if translated thus:

"He who bends will be perfected,
He who yields will be erected."

Where the verb "to erect" is used in its old sense
"to stablsh, to straighten."

CHAPTER 25.

The repetition in the last paragraph but one is obviously a commentator's gloss embodied in the text. The words "[There are four things in the world that are great, and Royalty is one of them]" ought to be omitted or at least placed in brackets, for the sake of indicating it as spurious. Judging from Professor Giles's quotation, the whole paragraph appears in Huai Nan Tze, and we must therefore assume that a copyist of the Tao Teh King, being familiar with Huai Nan Tze, inserted the passage into the text. In a similar way additions slipped into the text of the New Testament at a very early date, the best known instance being the close of the Lord's prayer.

CHAPTER 26.

Some editions of Han Fei Tze read in Chapter 26, II., 10 重 tsing, "gravity" or "dignity," not 輜 tsz', "baggage waggon." Since there are other editions of Han Fei Tze which read "baggage waggon," this latter version, in spite of its oddity, seems better attested and must be regarded as preferable. If it is the mistake of a copyist, it may fairly well be assumed to have slipped in before the time of Han Fei Tze.

The sense remains the same in either case. If we adopt the reading tsing, "gravity," we have the advantage only of being relieved of the responsibility to believe that "not to depart from the baggage waggon" means "to preserve a dignified deportment."

CHAPTER 27.

The last paragraph of this chapter is translated in the text on page III according to the traditional interpretation of the passage. If, however, we understand the word 師 shi in the sense of "multitude," and let the second word 善 shen "good" stand as a verb (which, however, does not accord with the interpretation given in the Japanese editions) we may translate as follows:

"Thus the good man does not respect multitudes of people. The bad man respects the people's wealth. Who has no regard for their multitudes, nor is charmed by their wealth, though his education be greatly neglected, he must be recognised as eminently profound."

We are indebted for this interpretation of the passage (doubtful though it may remain) to a quotation of one of Lao-Tze's sayings from Huai Nan Tze by Professor Giles, which reads:

不善人善人之資 "Do not value the man, value the man's abilities."

CHAPTER 29.

The character 甚 shǎn (III., 8) means first "pleasure or social delights," then "delightfully much" or "very" and it is not improbable that it here means "excess."

CHAPTER 30.

The last sentence of the second paragraph should read:

"Be resolute but not boastful, etc., . . . resolute because you cannot avoid it, resolute but not violent."

The negation 勿 wuh is frequently used (though not always) in the sense of the Latin ne, which renders it probable that the whole sentence is adhortative.

CHAPTER 31.

The translation as it stands (p. 113), "Even beautiful arms" is correct, but the context suggests that Lao-Tze meant by 佳 chia, "successful." Thus we prefer to read:

"Even when successful arms are unblessed."

CHAPTER 32.

The translation:

"Reason, in its eternal aspect, is unnameable," is more literal than:

"Reason, so long as it remains absolute," etc.

CHAPTER 36.

According to Lin H'i Yih we should translate the conclusion of Chapter 36:

"The fish should not leave the deep [nor we the Tao]: the empire's sharp tools should not be displayed before the people [nor should the Tao]."

Professor Giles offers the following explanation of sentence:

"Huai Nan Tzu says that a certain Minister in the State of Sung, descanting to his Sovereign on the importance of rewards and punishments in the administration, offered to undertake himself the infliction of the latter, so that the Prince, being associated in the minds of his people only with the distribution of honors, might gain a firmer hold upon their affections. The Prince was charmed; but from that moment the minister became the chief object of popular veneration, and before the year was out, he was sitting upon the throne of his beaten and exiled master. Therefore Lao-Tzu said:

"Fishes cannot be taken away from water; the instruments of government cannot be delegated to others."

It will be difficult to find a satisfactory interpretation of this passage.

CHAPTER 38.

Lao-Tze says: "Ch'ien shi (前識) is the mere flower (i. e., the showy sham) of reason, and of ignorance the beginning." I translated Ch'ien shi "premature knowledge," or "quickwittedness," but I have come to the conclusion that Lao-Tze here censures Confucianism. 前 ch'ien means "to advance; forward; in front; before; anciently." Considering the stress laid by the Chinese, and especially the Confucianists, upon a faithful preservation of the tradition handed down from ancient times, I believe not to miss the point when interpreting the phrase to mean "of ancient days the knowledge" and accordingly propose to translate "Traditionalism."

CHAPTER 39 AND 42.

Read "inferiors" for "widowers" on page 117, line 4 from below; and "an inferior" for "a widower," on page 119, line 15.

CHAPTER 49.

Read on page 121, last line: "Thus I actualise goodness" for "for virtue is good [throughout]"; and on page 122, second line: "Thus I actualise faith" for "for virtue is faithful [throughout]."

CHAPTER 50.

The first paragraph should be one sentence and we propose to read :

“He who starts in life will return in death.”

CHAPTER 56.

See comments on Chapter 4.

CHAPTER 63.

We might here as in other analogous cases read the several short sentences as one whole sentence. Thus I offer as another version of the beginning of Chapter 63 the following translation :

“He who acts as though he acted not (i. e., with non-assertion), he who carries on business as though he had no business, he who tastes as though he tasted not (i. e., he who enjoys pleasures as though he enjoyed them not), makes great what is small and renders plenty what is little.”

This would mean that such a man lives in the whole and walks on the heights of life. The universality of his mind takes away the limitations of particularity so that the great to him becomes as if it were small, while the small will be great, for isolated cases are instances representing whole classes and exemplifying universal laws.

If this were the correct interpretation of the passage, it would be an anticipation of the Buddhist idea to live in the world without clinging to its pleasures, and of the Christian sentiment expressed by St. Paul in 1 Cor. vii. 29-31, of using this world as not abusing it.

CHAPTER 70.

Professor Giles translates:

"Speech has its clue: actions have their motives. And it is because a man knows not the clue that he fails to understand my words."

It must be granted that 宗 tsung, "ancestor," and 君 chiün, "superior man" may be interpreted in an impersonal sense, but we are not inclined to accept Professor Giles's interpretation.

If the traditional version is not satisfactory, I offer the following translation as an alternative:

"Words impart authority, deeds afford superiority, but because they [viz., words and deeds], are not in evidence, therefore I am not appreciated. Those who know me are few and yet am I distinguished."

CHAPTER 71.

Professor Giles translates:

"To know, but to be as though not knowing,—is good. Not to know, but to be as though knowing,—is evil."

I am not sure that Professor Giles is right; but his version seems to me as unobjectionable as is mine. So I quote it without further comment.

CHAPTER 73.

The following version may be preferable:

"Courage, if it implies daring, leads to death; but courage, if it implies the restraint from daring, leads to life."

ALTERNATIVE VERSIONS AND COMMENTS.

CHAPTER 23.

Professor Giles's version of a quotation from Huai Nan Tze, suggests the idea of a new interpretation of the middle and end of Chapter 23, as follows:

"Thus those who pursue their business with Reason, are, as men of Reason, united in Reason. The men who pursue their business with virtue, are united in virtue. Those who pursue their business with loss (ill luck), are united in loss (ill luck).

"When united in Reason, then in Reason they are glad in their turn to find companions (fellow workers). When united in virtue, then in virtue in their turn they are glad to find companions. When united in loss (ill luck), then in loss (ill luck) in their turn, they are glad to find companions.

"Those whose faith is insufficient shall not find faith."

CHAPTER 38.

The passage of Chapter 38:

上德不德是以有德 下德不失德是以無德

which as the text reads in the Tao Teh King is directed against Confucian ceremonialism and its intricate prescriptions of propriety is in another version also credited by Han Fei Tze to the Yellow Emperor. The context is that "Inferior virtue never loses sight of virtue," and "genuine virtue is un-virtue." Chuang Tze, however, repeats the character shih, "loss," a second time at the end of each sentence, reversing the sense of the words which now might serve as an argument for the Confucian method of curing the ills of mankind by teaching people to be punctilious in ceremonialism.

失道而後失德 失德而後失仁 失仁而後失義
失義而後失禮

Professor Giles translates the sentence thus:

"If the way perishes, then the virtue will perish.
[If the virtue perishes, then charity will perish.]<sup>1</sup>
If charity perishes, then duty to one's neighbor will perish. If duty to one's neighbor perishes, then ceremonies will perish."

The old Lao-Tze as we know him would have said that no harm would be done if ceremonialism perished. Let the Tao be preserved and there is no need of rules of propriety.

CHAPTER 28.

Here our author deals with the virtues that qualify a ruler to govern a country. It concludes with the proposition: 大制不割.

The second character means "to cut; govern; a law-practice," and the last one, "to cut; to injure;" accordingly we have translated the passage:

"A great administration does not injure."

Professor Giles quotes two stories from Huai Nan Tze about princes that wanted to study the art of government. The second one reads as follows:

"A Prince of the Chow State, being similarly about to receive instruction in the art of government, asked his teacher to confine himself to such rules as would apply to Chow. 'If what I say is generally imprac-licable,' replied the teacher, 'it will be impracticable for Chow; and vice versa.' "

On the basis of the illustrations offered by Huai Nan Tze we may accept Professor Giles's translation: "A great principle cannot be divided."

The second character may mean "principle" as well as "government," and the last one may mean "cuts" as well as "is cut," but I say advisedly it may be so. The following translation may be preferable: "By scattering simplicity, one becomes a vessel of usefulness. The holy man by applying it (simplicity) becomes a chief and a leader; for a great principle cannot be limited" [i. e., it must be universally applied].

That critics of mine would object to the translation of Tao by "Reason" could be anticipated, for I myself am not satisfied with it. I chose it because I found no better English word. To leave it untranslated as do Chalmers and many other translators seemed to me unjustifiable, for the word Tao is a word of common use in China, as common as is the word Reason, with this exception though, that a religious awe is attached to it, in the same way as the early Christians used the term λόγος. A foreign word with an outlandish sound such as is the word Tao to the English and American public, makes on us another impression than does the vernacular expression Tao on the Chinese mind.

While it is difficult to translate the word Tao appropriately, we know very well its significance and in reply to the Rev. Spurgeon Medhurst I would urge that the word cannot be translated by "realisation."

Tao is never actuality or any process of becoming, but always a method ; it is the rule or principle of existing conditions and the way in which all the several realisations take place. As such it is eternal and not transient ; it is immutable and not changing ; it does not labor, not work, not plod ; it has no desires ; it does not seek its own : yet is it efficient everywhere. Obviously Lao-Tze's Tao is not reason in the common sense, but rationality, or the reason of reason, viz., the rational principle or law of man's rational faculty. It is not human reason ; but the eternal prototype of reason ; not the actuality of rational thought, but the standard of reasoning ; not subjective thinking, but the objective standard of truth. It is the universal and eternal world-order which shapes and conditions all things ; that intangible harmony of all natural law ; the logic of science ; the norm of right and wrong ; the standard of truth and of morality. Further, we must bear in mind that the devotional sentiment toward the Tao is uppermost in the heart of Lao-Tze. He loves the Tao as a son cherishes and reveres his mother. The scientific aspect is not absent, but merely subsidiary.

The word Reason is decidedly objectionable because it served in a certain period of our development the purpose of opposing our traditional faith and smacks not of rationality only but also, and in the conception of many, pre-eminently of rationalism. Rationalism is a religio-philosophical movement of the eighteenth century. The rationalists were justified in many of their contentions, but it may be fairly granted that they were lacking in a comprehension of the poetry of religion. They were prosaic and narrow, thus they failed to understand the nature of the religious attitude and the mystical language which religion employs. Though Lao-Tze is a philosopher and a man who cherishes the eternal prototype of reason, he was far from the dry and somewhat superficial rationalism of the eighteenth century. It is therefore to be kept in mind that "reason" to Lao-Tze is not the reason of the rationalists but of the mystics. It is what a man of Jacob Böhme's stamp might have called Urvernunft; the archetype of reason.

My critics may believe me that I have very well considered the advisability of leaving the word Tao untranslated, and have adopted its most common English equivalent not without reluctance and only after due deliberation.

There is no equivalent for the word λόγος in any of the modern languages, and yet the translators of the New Testament have not hesitated to translate it by Word; they did not leave it untranslated but expected that the reader of the fourth Gospel would learn to understand the extraordinary significance of the term, leaving the retention of the original λόγος to scholars to whom the word possesses the associations of their Greek vocabulary.

Tao is by no means the most untranslatable word in the Tao Teh King. Take, for instance, the word ming, which means "name" as much as Tao means "method, principle, or reason." Lao-Tze uses it in a peculiar sense, speaking of "the eternal name," being that name which "cannot be named." Suppose we should leave untranslated all words that in their special connexions do not possess perfect equivalents in English. The result would be mystifying. If we retained all the terms that have no proper significance in English, our translation would read like the following sample :

“The Tao that cannot be taoed is not the eternal Tao;

The ming that cannot be minged is not the eternal ming.

The wu-ming is of heaven and earth the beginning;

The ming is of the ten thousand things the mu [mother].”

It is generally granted that the term wu wei “non-action,” or “non-assertion” is untranslatable; and so is its opposite wei “to act, to do, to interfere.” Should we then retain the terms and translate the famous passage in Chapter 37:

“The Tao is always wu-weiing and nothing remains unweied.”

Such would be the result of preserving the original words, but I maintain that the method would prove satisfactory only to those who have grown accustomed to the original words, not to others. This consideration influenced me when I finally decided to choose the homespun English term “reason” as the best word that could be had to translate Tao.

Professor Giles translates Tao by “Way,” and claims that Tao never means “reason.” In his dictionary he defines Tao:

“A road; a path; a way. Hence the road par excellence; the right way; the true path; the truth; religion.”

I do not propose to quarrel with Professor Giles, for he is very emphatic on the subject and brooks no objection; but I would suggest to lexicographers of French dictionaries (for the sake of pleasing Professor Giles) to bear in mind that the French word raison should not be translated in English by “reason,” for raison means (1) the faculty of understanding; (2) the principle of explanation, and (3) an argument; but it is quite inadmissible to render it by "reason."

* * *

The Rev. C. Spurgeon Medhurst,<sup>1</sup> a Christian missionary to China, while speaking very kindly of my edition and translation of the Tao Teh King, criticises me for translating the words tsung, "ancestor," and chiün, "master or superior man," (Chapter 70, II., 11 and 14), and I grant that Tsung might as well mean "ancestral hall"; as well as "ancestry" and chiün "mastership,"<sup>2</sup> both words being synonyms, denoting authority, and we may translate:

"Words imply authority, deeds imply a maxim; since they are not understood, therefore I am not understood."

In conclusion I may be permitted to quote two passages from Mr. Spurgeon Medhurst's article on the Tao Teh King. In comparing the Tao Teh King with the Bible, he says:

"All divisions disappear in the higher regions of thought, and Lao-Tze's doctrine may be styled the Vedântism of China. Neither so abstruse nor so metaphysical as that religious philosophy, as the Chinese are less given to speculative thought than the Hindoos, it nevertheless brings the same peace to its adherents—foreshadowings of that divine rest which Jesus Christ gives to all who receive Him. Lao teaches that thought is more powerful than speech, meditation more potent than action, humility a readier means to fulfill the wishes of even the ambitious than strife, and one rises from a prolonged perusal of his pages with a delightful sense of refreshment and an uncomfortable suspicion that many of the necessitous works of our nineteenth century civilisation are impertinences, while such Scriptures as the following are recalled to mind: 'Set your mind on things that are above, not on things that are on the earth.' 'Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth.' 'Seek ye first His kingdom and His righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you.' 'In returning and rest shall ye be saved; in quietness and confidence shall be your strength.' Occasionally Lao-Tze's utterances remind us irresistibly of some passage in the gospels, e. g., 'Let your Tao be deep and use it, and see that it does not overflow.' In the Gospels we read, 'Take heed that ye do not your righteousness before men, to be seen of them.' Again, 'Requite hatred with goodness,' says Lao-Tze in the 63rd chapter of his manual, words all but identical with the command of Jesus, 'Love your enemies, do good to them that hate you.' A passage in chapter 45, 'He who regards his greatest achievements as unattained, may employ himself without decay. He who regards his greatest fulness as emptiness, may employ himself without exhaustion,' is a comment on our Lord's words, 'When ye shall have done all the things that are commanded you, say we are unprofitable servants; we have done that which it was our duty to do.'

<sup>2</sup> The dictionary offers as the last meaning of chiün, "to rule; to fulfil the duties of a ruler." The significance "maxim" or "rule," although not specially mentioned, is not at all impossible. We must bear in mind, however, that the commentators interpret the terms tsung and chiün in the sense of "ancestor" and "master" as denoting a person or personification.

"These selections have been made at random. They might easily be multiplied, and it would be a good object lesson for our Chinese brethren if some Careful reader were to select all the passages in the Tao Teh King which illustrate Christian truth and print them with the Scriptures they illustrate.

"Under the circumstances the average Chinese missionary ought to be more familiar than he is with the thoughts of Lao-Tze. He may supply a lesser number of quotable phrases than the Four Books and the Five Classics, but he is the least racial and most universal writer China has ever produced. A study of him, even in English, will materially add to any man's equipment, though no translation can convey a true conception of the original."

As to the authenticity of the Tao Teh King, which is so vigorously denied by Professor Giles, I have to say that after a careful consideration of all the arguments brought forth by him in support of his theory I have become more convinced than ever that the bulk of the Tao Teh King is genuine.<sup>1</sup> But even if Professor Giles were right, if the Tao Teh King were a pious fraud, what would it matter? The book would lose nothing of its interest and importance.

It is the ideas in a book that interest us, not the author. The author interests us only on account of the ideas contained in his book.

In the present case, Professor Giles (the representative of the spirit of negation in the domain of the Higher Criticism of the Taoist canon) does not deny that the gems of thought in the Tao Teh King are genuine. And suppose even they were not genuine utterances of the old philosopher, they would lose none of their value or worth, which is intrinsic and indubitable. They would be the sentiments of some other sage of ancient China,—for ancient they must be, unless we deny that there was any literature in ancient China; otherwise, how could they be quoted so frequently by ancient authors?

And Lao Tze's greatness cannot be diminished so long as that single sentence must be attributed to him:

報怨以德

"Requite hatred with virtue."

The question of the authenticity of the Tao Teh King sinks into insignificance, so long as this word (as Professor Giles grants) remains genuine. "It has justly been held," says Professor Giles, "to confer upon its author the cachet of a great Teacher," and adds he, "here we must take the shoes off our feet and admit that we are upon holy ground."

PRONUNCIATION.

It cannot be the purpose of this book to give instruction in pronunciation. Nor is the author in any way competent to do so. He has been informed that the niceties on which the Rev. Mr. Candlin insists,<sup>1</sup> especially the pronunciation of j with the sound of r (jen = English wren), are peculiar to Peking, Tientsin, and the neighboring parts of the province of Chihli.

Since publishing the first edition of this book, the author had the pleasure of making the acquaintance of Dr. Robert Lilley, one of the editors of the Century Dictionary, and Managing Editor of Appleton's Universal Cyclopædia, who acquired an unusual familiarity with the Chinese language and classics during his long sojourn in, and extended travels through, China. His rules of pronunciation, made for the use of those who were handling the sumptuous work on Oriental Ceramic Art, which he edited for D. Appleton & Co., proved so useful that with his permission I publish them here:

THE PRONUNCIATION OF CHINESE.

Three things are to be kept in mind:

First, that all Chinese words are in one syllable, though it may take several words to make up one name, or to express an idea which in English is expressed in one word.

Second, that the vowels used in the system of transliteration now in vogue are not pronounced as in English, but as in Italian. That is—a has the sound of a in father, far.

e (as a final) has the sound of a in fâte, lâte, or of ay in play, may.

e followed by n has the sound of e in hen, pen, ten, etc.

ê is a conventional sign introduced by the late Sir Thomas Francis Wade, whose method of transliterating Chinese is now widely adopted. It is just our short u (ü), as in fun, run, but, lung, etc., which, if Wade's system prevailed in English, would be spelled fên, rên, bêt, lêng, etc., and the motto of a well-known morning paper published in New York would be, "If you see it in the Sên, it's so." The name of the city Ching-tê-chên is thus Ching (rhyming with string), tũ (like the word touch or tough, with the -ch or -gh suddenly omitted in the pronunciation), and chũn (rhyming with Hun).

i has the sound of ee in seen, screen, teeth, or of ea in lean.

o has the sound of ô in go, so, lo, home, etc. In some words, as in to, many, the o is followed by a sort of gliding a, and sounds like to'ah.

u has the sound of oo in soon, school, or of oe in shoe.

ũ is just the same as ê, already explained.

ü is the French u.

When two vowels come together in the same syllable, they are rapidly pronounced one after the other, according to the key given above, and so as to produce practically a single sound. Hence—ai is just the sound of a (in father) followed so rapidly by i (in machine) that the result is eye, rhyming with high, fly, sky, my, etc.

ao is just the a (of father) and the o (of so), pronounced so rapidly that the sound of ow in scow, plow, etc., is produced.

au is very nearly the same as ow, but some make it rhyme with law, straw, etc.

ei equals long ā, and rhymes with hay, stay, play, etc.

ia, in such words as liang, ounce, Liang, the name of a dynasty, etc., the first vowel i is a very short ee, very rapidly pronounced, followed by a (in father), producing a sort of broken or dislocated monosyllable like this, lēē-ang', the accent being on the second part. So also with ie, which is like ie in siesta, and the words nien (year), tien (a spot or dot, an inn), etc., are pronounced nēē-en', tēē-en'. Ch'ien is ch'ēē-en', and so with the others.

[It is to be noted that these words ending with -en rhyme with hen, pen.]

iu is pronounced you or yew.

ou is not oo, nor is it ow, but something between the two; that is, it is not pronounced like u, nor is it exactly like ao. For ordinary purposes, however, it may be pronounced either way. In Peking, Tientsin, and some other parts of the province of Chihli this ou or ow is pronounced ō, as Fung-chō for Fung-chow.

u = oo, and rhymes with too, shoe, etc.; when preceded by i or y it takes the sound of u in use, abuse, profuse, or of ew in few. Yu equals English you or yew.

üe is pronounced as ue in duet.

uo occurs several times in this book, as in chuo (nightingale).

Here we have the sound of chew followed quickly with an ō, with the accent on the ō; so with Shuo (speak, say), as in T'ao Shuo, Essay on Pottery, we have shoe-oh pronounced with the slightest break between the two vowel sounds. Some say, tow' shwō'.

ua (when not preceded by i or y) equals wa in wax; so that Kuang-yao is pronounced Kwang-yow; Huang-ho (the Yellow River) becomes Hwang-hō or Whang-hō.

uei equals English way; so that huei becomes English whey, kuei (honor, honors, honorable, dear, etc.) becomes kwāy.

ui nearly equals the English pronoun we; so that shui (water) becomes shwee.

Third, the consonants are pronounced as in English, with the exception of j, noted below.

ch as in church, check (not sh).

h, as an initial, is like h in hang, hog, hoe.

Final h is used in those words which in the southern dialects would end with k, p, or t. It shortens the preceding vowel and gives an abruptness to the ending of the word, as in tieh (a plate), which is pronounced tēē-h.

hs is a refinement which may be disregarded, and pronounced as English sh, as in shut, should, etc. Chinese hsien (an immortal or fairy) may be pronounced shēē-en', though a Chinese scholar would give the hs a more hissing sound.

j has the sound of j in the French jamais, or jaune, or of s in the English word pleasure.

'rh = ur in fur.

ssū has the sound which su, in such, would have if somebody clapped his hand on your mouth before you had got to the ch part.

sz' is very like siz- in the word sizzle, with the i smothered and done for in the pronunciation, and the z followed by a very feeble ê or ü.

ts has the sound of its with the i omitted. There is a phrase fei-ts'ui, meaning "Kingfisher's plumes." It would be correctly pronounced if in uttering the English words "faith, it's we," you omitted the th of the first word and the i of the second (fay-tswee).

tz is pretty much the same as ts, a z sound being substituted for the s.

yu is pronounced like iu.

THE ASPIRATE.—In some words an apostrophe is sometimes found after the first consonant or double consonant, as in K'ang-hsi, Ch'ang-an, t'ien, T'ang, etc. This indicates a light breathing, which would be better indicated by an h, which, however, cannot be so used with all consonants. Khang-hsi is all right, but with t the combination would be mistaken, and the th would be pronounced as in English thing, think, thank, etc. Hence the use of the apostrophe instead of h. The best illustration that can be given of the nature of this aspirate is that contained in the Irishman's challenge, "T'ramp on the t'ail of me c'oat if ye d'ar'!" In Chinese, Tao differs from T'ao, Kang from K'ang, Ching from ch'ing, chen from ch'ien, pan from p'an, in pronunciation and in meaning. So throughout.

The system of orthography to which these notes refer is that adopted in the diplomatic, consular, and customs services in China, and is an attempt to introduce a uniform and scientific scheme of transliteration. It represents the Peking sounds of the Mandarin dialect,—a dialect which is spoken with many variations throughout three-fourths of China proper and in Manchuria. Ch in the Pekingese takes the place of the k and ts of the southern or Nanking variety of Mandarin; hs takes the place of the peculiar "double aspirate" of initial h before i or e; and ê takes the place of the short ü of some writers, the short ä of others, and in many instances of i. Thus K'ien-lung becomes Ch'ien-lung; Kia-tsing becomes Chia-ching; hien becomes hsien; King-teh-chin becomes Ching-tê-chên, etc.

* * *

Homonyms are numerous. In Pekingese there are not more than 450 sounds (omitting the variations produced by what are called the "Tones"). It happens, therefore, that of the 20,000 or more characters and hieroglyphs in the Chinese language, a great many are pronounced in the same way. Actual count in Williams's Syllabic Dictionary shows 25 different characters called Pao, each differing widely from the others in written form and in meaning, and 19 more pronounced P'ao. So with the other sounds. It is hoped, however, that what has been given above will be a sufficient guide to intelligent persons in their attempts to get their tongues around syllables which to some may seem uncouth and unpronounceable. Refinements have not been attempted.

INTRODUCTION

THE OLD PHILOSOPHER.

老子

L AO-TZE,<sup>1</sup> or "the old philosopher," is the designation of one of the most remarkable thinkers of mankind. He was a Chinese who lived in the sixth century B.C., and left to the world the Tao-Teh-King, a small book on Reason and Virtue, which not only exercised a powerful influence upon his countrymen but is also worthy to be compared with the sacred scriptures of the Buddhists and the New Testament. It is on account of the similarities which, in spite of many differences, obtain between the teachings of Lao-Tze and those of Buddha and Christ that the Tao-Teh-King is an indispensable book; and no one who is interested in religion can afford to leave it unread.

The date of Lao-Tze's birth<sup>2</sup> is the third year of the Emperor Ting-wang of the Cho dynasty, which corresponds to the year 604 B. C.

Lao-Tze's family name, 李 (Li), means Plum-tree. His proper name, 耳 (Er),<sup>3</sup> means Ear. His appellation was 伯陽 (Po Yang), viz., "Count of the Positive Principle," representing manliness, the sun, and the South;<sup>1</sup> his posthumous title was 聃 (Tan) long-lobed, long lobes being a sign of virtue. But the people called him simply 老子 (Lao-Tze), the old philosopher. He is also frequently named 老君 (Lao Chün), the ancient sire, master, or prince; and 老兒 (Lao Er), the old child, which means, "he who even as an old man remains childlike." His followers, the Taoists, speak of him as 太上老君 (t'ai shang lao chün), the greatly eminent ancient master, or simply 太上 (t'ai shang), the greatly Eminent One.

Lao-Tze was born in 曲仁 (Ch'ü-Jhren,) a village in 厲鄉 (Li-county) belonging to the 苦縣 (K'u province) of the state 楚 (Ch'u). Abel Rémusat<sup>2</sup> states on the authority of Kwang-Yu-Ki (VI. 15) that:

"Ch'ü-Jhren is situated in the vicinity of the present city of Lu-i, a town of the third order, belonging to Kwei-te-foo of the province Ho-nan (lat. 34° north, long. 114° 54' west of Peking)."

Robert K. Douglas, professor of sinology at Oxford, England, calls attention to the strange coincidence that the name of the hamlet Ch'ü-Jhren, Lao-Tze's place of birth, means "oppressed benevolence"; Li, the parish to which it belongs, means "cruelty"; K'u, the name of the district, means "bitterness"; Ch'u, the philosopher's native state, means "suffering."<sup>3</sup> He adds:

"If these places were as mythical as John Bunyan's 'City of Destruction' and 'Vanity Fair,' their names could not have been more appropriately chosen to designate the birthplace of a sage who was driven from office and from friends by the disorders of the time." Society in China, p. 403.

Considering the denunciations which Lao-Tze hurled against both "oppression" and "false benevolence"; and the "bitterness" and "sufferings" which he had to endure, the meaning of these names seems startling enough, and were these places not actually in existence they would suggest that Lao-Tze's birth and life were a myth. But Professor Douglas might have added that the coincidence, interesting though it is, is not as remarkable as it appears to Europeans who are unacquainted with the peculiarities of the Chinese language which make such a play of words possible and quite common; for puns are far easier in Chinese than even in French.

Let us look at each name more closely.

曲 (Ch'ü) means "crooked" or, as a noun, "a bend," then "scheming," "false," "forced," and finally, in the sense of the German phrase gebundene Rede, it denotes "verses," especially "songs, ditties, and ballads." (K., Vol. 17, p. 12 B; W. S. D., p. 458.)

仁 (Jhren<sup>1</sup>) means "that which is enclosed, or the kernel of a thing"; then "the essence of man's heart or humaneness"; it also means "the humane or good man." (K., Vol. 6, p. 1 A.) Should the name Ch'u-Jhren be translated according to its proper meaning, it probably ought to be "Good Man's Bend," that is to say, a bend in a valley named after a person whose epithet was "the good man."

厲 (Li) means "whetstone; grinding; oppression; danger; disorder." As a verb it means "to grind; to chide; to goad." The name might be translated in English as "Grinding," and Li Hsiang would be "grinding county." It may have been called so on account of being a place where whetstones were found, or made, or sold. (K'anghi, Vol. 7, p. 47 A.)

苦 (K'u) is the name of the common-thistle. In addition, the word means "bitter ; unpleasant ; mortifying." As a noun it means "affliction"; as a verb, "to hasten ; to be sick." K'u Hien, accordingly, might be translated "thistle province." (K'anghi, Vol. 29, p. 7 A; Williams's Syl. Dict., p. 436.)

楚 (Ch'u) means "a bramble bush" or "a clump of trees." As an adjective it means "full of spines, full of thorns," denoting at the same time "distress" and "pain." If we can translate the name Ch'u at all we might call it "the state of the bramble-bush" or "the state of briars." In addition to all these meanings, the word Ch'u means "orderly ; well done ; properly finished."<sup>1</sup> What a choice of allusions cannot be had in Chinese names !

As to the authenticity of the Tao-Teh-King and the historical reality of Lao-Tze's life, there can be no doubt. 司馬遷 Sze-Ma-Ch'ien, the Herodotus of Chinese history,<sup>2</sup> has embodied a brief account of Lao-Tze's life in his famous 史記 (Shi-Ki), or Historical Records, which were completed in 91 B. C.

Sze-Mâ-Ch'ien's report of Lao-Tze's life is very terse. It consists only of two hundred and forty-eight words, but is full of interest and very important as the most reliable account that has been handed down to later generations. For these reasons it has been incorporated in the present edition as a kind of preface which will splendidly serve as an authentic historical introduction to the Tao-Teh-King.

But even before Sze-Ma-Ch'ien, Lao-Tze has been mentioned, commented upon, and largely quoted by a number of his disciples, among whom Lieh-Tze<sup>1</sup> is the oldest, and Chwang-Tze<sup>2</sup> the most ingenious and most famous. Literal quotations from the Tao-Teh-King in the writings of Lieh-Tze, of Han-Fi-Tze,<sup>3</sup> of Chwang-Tze, of Liu-An,<sup>4</sup> of the historian Sze-Ma-Ch'ien himself, and of other authors are so frequent and at the same time so accurate that they verify more than two-thirds of the whole Tao-Teh-King. Professor Legge says:

"I do not know of any other book of so ancient a date as the Tao-Teh-King of which the authenticity of the origin and the genuineness of the text can claim to be so well substantiated."<sup>5</sup>

While the Tao-Teh-King as a genuine production of the age, and Lao-Tze's authorship of the book are beyond dispute, its very existence is a historical problem which has not as yet found its solution. Were Lao-Tze not six hundred years older than Christ, and a hundred years older than Buddha, we should be inclined to believe that he had borrowed his main ideas from either Buddhism or Christianity; but that is a theory which is impossible. Nevertheless, Professor Douglas believes he finds traces of Brahmanical influence in the Tao-Teh-King, and argues that Lao-Tze was a descendant of one of the Western nations of the Chinese Empire, which may have been in connexion with India since olden times. Taking for granted that the name Er, i. e. Ear, was a sobriquet given to Lao-Tze on account of the unusual size of his ears, Professor Douglas says:

"It is remarkable that the description of his large ears and general appearance tallies accurately with those of the non-Chinese tribes on the western frontiers of the empire. His surname, Li, also reminds one of the large and important tribe of that name which was dispossessed by the invading Chinese, and was driven to seek refuge in what is now South-Western China. But however that may be, it is impossible to overlook the fact that he imported into his teachings a decided flavor of Indian philosophy." (Society in China, p. 403.)

Douglas goes so far as to find a strong resemblance between Lao-Tze's Tao and the pre-Buddhistic Brahmanism of the Indian sages, which, however, I am unable to discover. No doubt there are similarities between Indian and Chinese doctrines, but they are too vague and do not prove a common origin; and we must bear in mind that certain similarities of doctrines, nay, also of superstitions, arise naturally in the course of evolution. We must grant, however, that when Lao-Tze resigned his position as custodian of the archives of Cho<sup>1</sup> he went West, which seems to indicate that his sympathies were bound up with those Western people whom his parents may have praised to him as models of simplicity and virtue.

We cannot say that the Brahmanical origin of Lao-Tze's philosophy has been proved. The whole proposition remains a vague hypothesis whose main right to existence consists in the fact that we know too little either to substantiate or to refute it.

THE FUNDAMENTAL PRINCIPLE OF LAO-TZE'S PHILOSOPHY.

道

THE idea that constitutes the corner-stone of Lao-Tze's philosophy is contained in the word Tao, which, however, is so general and comprehensive a term, that his propositions naturally would appear to have existed in a vague form long before him. The universal use of the word gives to his thoughts the appearance of an old doctrine, yet it seems improbable that such an original and extraordinary thinker, as was Lao-Tze, could, like Confucius, have been a mere transmitter of traditions.

The term 道 (tao) is a remarkable word.<sup>1</sup> It means "path, way, method, or mode of doing a thing," then also, the mode of expressing a thing, or "word;" and thus finally it acquires its main meaning, which is "reason." As a verb, it means "to walk, or to tread; to speak or to declare; to argue or to reason." Considering the religious reverence in which the term is held, the expression Tao, meaning "word" and "logical thought" at the same time, presents a close analogy to the Neo-Platonic term λόγος. The Buddhists use the word Tao as a synonym of 明 (ming), enlightenment, to translate the Sanskrit बुद्धि (bódhi), and the Christians employ it in the version of the New Testament for the term λόγος, "word."

The term "word" in the sense of Logos as used in the New Testament occurs also in the Rig-Veda where the fourth hymn is devoted to the Vâch (latin, vox), "pervading heaven and earth, existing in all the worlds and extending to heaven." Still another striking parallelism is found in the Zoroastrian creed which proclaims that Ahura Mazda, the Lord Omniscient, had created the world by pronouncing the excellent, the pure, and stirring word (Ahuna Vairyo, Honover), "the word that existed before everything else."

The same difficulty which translators encounter in their attempts to find a proper rendering of the term λόγος, exists for the term Tao. We might translate it "word," or (as does Stanislas Julien) "path," or (as does Gabelentz) "logos;" or we might (as do Chalmers, Legge, and Victor von Strauss) retain the Chinese word Tao. After a long deliberation the author of the present edition has come to the conclusion that the simplest and most ordinary English analogue for Tao, which is "Reason," would be preferable. But in order to remind his readers of the more comprehensive significance of the word, he has in his translation capitalised it throughout.

The Tao is Kant's "purely formal." Thus it is called 大狀 (ta chwang), the great form, and 大象 (ta hsiang), the great image<sup>1</sup> (Chap. 35). Other expressions of a similar significance are 寥 (liao), vacancy, or a condition of not being occupied, (see Williams, S. D., p. 528) and 寂 (chi), noiselessness, or a void of activity. It is the Absolute whose essence is not concrete being, but abstract law. To characterise the former, the absence of all the concrete reality, it is called 無 (wu), or the non-existent; to characterise the latter, the abstractness of this highest of all generalisations, it is called 冲 (ch'ung), hollowness, or 虛 (hsü), emptiness, or the void.<sup>1</sup> As the ultimate ground of existence it is called 玄 (hsüen), abyss, an expression which reminds one of the Neo-Platonic βῦδος, and the Urgrund of German mystics.

The terms 狀 (ch'wang), form, and 象 (hsiang), image, are commonly used to denote material or concrete forms, but Lao-Tze means pure form, which in his paradoxical mode of speaking is expressed in the terms 無狀之狀 (wu ch'wang chih ch'wang), the form of the formless, or 無象之象 (wu hsiang chih<sup>2</sup> hsiang), the image of that which has no image, i. e., no concrete shape. In a word, "the form of the formless" means the ideal, the abstract, the universal.

Lao-Tze distinguishes two kinds of Tao or Reason: (1) the Tao that was in the beginning, that is eternal and immutable, the divine presence, which can be on the right hand and at the same time on the left hand, which is bodiless, immaterial, and not sense-perceptible; and (2) the Tao that is individualised in

Williams defines hsü (p. 227) as "empty; vacant; empty of passions and able to receive, quiet; a vacant, abstracted, contemplative condition such as Buddhists aim to reach; space." Empty space is to both the Taoists and the Buddhists the symbol of absolute rest. (See, e. g., in Samuel Beal's Catena of Buddhist Scriptures, p. 157, the simile of the restlessness of dust particles in space, while "the nature of space is rest.") living creatures, especially in man. The latter denotes the reasoning powers of man and is called 人道 (Jhren tao), human Reason; the former is characterised as 常道 (ch'ang tao), the eternal Reason, or 天道 (t'ien tao), Heaven's Reason. It is identified with 玄 (hsüen), the mysterious abyss of existence. As the mystery of existence it is called 無名 (wu-ming), the Ineffable or Nameless. It is 根 (ken), the Root from which everything proceeds and to which everything returns. Although the source of all things, it is itself 無源 (wu-yuen), the Sourceless, i. e., Spinoza's causa sui.

Hsü, vacancy, is a synonym of k'ung (W. S. D., p. 464), ecstasy, trance, transport, which is a favorite term with the Buddhists.

The difference between the eternal Reason, ch'ang tao, and the Reason individualised in man, Jhren tao, is emphasised again and again in the Tao-Teh-King; and Chwang-Tze says<sup>1</sup> (Book XI., last paragraph):

"There is the Tao, or Way, of Heaven; and there is the Tao, or Way, of Man. Practising non-assertion<sup>2</sup> and yet attracting all honor is the Way of Heaven; asserting oneself and being embarrassed thereby, is the Way of Man. It is the Way of Heaven that plays the part of the lord; it is the Way of Man that plays the part of the servant. The Way of Heaven and the Way of Man are far apart. They should be clearly distinguished from each other."

Says Chwang-Tze:

"The Tao is always one, and yet it requires change," which means, the Tao is sameness in difference. The same law produces under different conditions different results. The Tao is the world-former, not the world-creator; it is not action but law. Yet it is not merely immanent, it is supernatural and prenatal. It is omnipresent in the world but would exist even though the world did not exist. Says Chwang-Tze (Book VI.):

<sup>2</sup> We replace "Doing nothing," which is a misleading translation, by "Practising non-assertion" for reasons given further on.

"If you could hide the world in the world, so that there was nowhere to which it could be removed, this [Tao] would be the grand reality of the ever-enduring thing." (Sacred Books of the East, XXXIX., p. 242.)

The philosophy of Lao-Tze, which places the Tao at the beginning of the world, is the echo of a thinker who was engaged with the same problem as the author of the Fourth Gospel. We read in the Tao-Teh-King that the Tao, far from being made by God, must be prior even to God, for God could never have existed without it, and that, therefore, the Tao may claim the right of priority. Lao-Tze says: "I know not whose son Reason (i. e., the eternal Reason) can be. It seems to be prior to God" (chapter 4); and, following the precedence of the fourth Gospel, Christians will feel inclined to add: "καὶ θεὸς ἦν ὁ λόγος," that is to say, "the Word, the Tao, the Logos, is uncreated, and it is part and parcel of God's being."

What a strange contrast! The Logos or Tao (i. e., the eternal rationality that conditions the immutable laws of the world-order) is, according to Lao-Tze, prior to God; it is God's ancestor or father; but according to Christian doctrines, it is the son of God, not created but begotten in eternity. At first sight both statements are contradictory, but is not after all the fundamental significance in either case the same?

The highest laws of reason are universal and intrinsically necessary; we cannot even imagine that they ever had been or ever could be non-existent or invalid; they have not been fashioned or ordained, they have not been made either by God or man, they are eternal and immutable.

The eternal Reason manifests itself in the laws of nature. Chwang-Tze says:

"When the body of man comes from its special mould [the ever-enduring thing], there is even then occasion for joy; but this body undergoes a myriad transformations, and does not immediately reach its perfection;—does it not thus afford occasion for joys incalculable? Therefore the sagely man enjoys himself in that from which there is no possibility of separation [viz., the Tao], and by which all things are preserved. He considers early death or old age, his beginning and his ending, all to be good, and in this other men imitate him;—how much more will they do so in regard to That Itself on which all things depend, and from which every transformation arises!" (Ibid., p. 243.)

Human reason, Jhren-tao, or the reason that can be reasoned, tao-k'o-tao, which is contrasted to the ch'ang-tao, or the eternal Reason, shows itself in man's interference with the natural course of things. Chwang-Tze says (Book XVII.):

"Oxen and horses have four feet. That is what is called the heaven-ordained. When horses' heads are haltered, and the noses of oxen are pierced, that is called the man-ordained. Therefore it is said: Do not by the man-ordained obliterate the heaven-ordained; do not for your purposes obliterate the decrees of heaven; do not bury your fame in such a pursuit. Carefully persevere in and do not lose it (the Tao). This is what I call reverting to your true (Nature)." (Ibid., p. 384.)

Man's aspiration should not be to follow that which is merely human in him, but that which is eternal; and eternal is alone the Tao, the Reason, the Ultimate Norm of Existence. Thus we find a contrast between 人心 (Jhren hsin), the human heart, and 道心 (tao hsin), the Rational heart; the former being perverse, the latter a realisation of right feeling, right thinking, and right doing. We read in the Shu-King, I., p. 3, 人心惟危 道心惟微 惟精惟一 允執厥中 Jhren hsin wei wei, tao hsin wei wei, wei ching wei yi yun chih chüeh chung, "the human heart is jeopardised; but the rational heart is subdued [attenuated]; it is genuine; is unified; thus it keeps its middle (path)."<sup>1</sup>

Lao-Tze's whole philosophy can be condensed in these words: "Men, as a rule, attempt for personal ends to change the Tao that is eternal; they endeavor to create or make a Tao of their own. But when they make, they mar; all they should do is to let the eternal Tao have its way, and otherwise be heedless of consequences, for then all will be well." Christ expresses the same sentiment: "Seek ye first the Kingdom of God and His righteousness; and all these things (the necessities of life) shall be added unto you."

The Tao is not merely a logical principle, it is not "reason" as we commonly use the term; it is clothed with all the awe and reverence of the highest religious idea. Says Chwang-Tze:

"This is the Tao;—there is in It emotion and sincerity, but It does nothing and has no bodily form. It may be handed down (by the teacher), but may not be received (by his scholars). It may be apprehended (by the mind), but It cannot be perceived [by the senses]. It has Its root and ground in itself. Before there were heaven and earth, from of old, there It was, securely existing. From It came the mysterious existences of spirits, from It the mysterious existence of God. It produced heaven; It produced earth. It was before the T'ai Chi [the primordial ether]."<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> This famous passage which is frequently quoted in Chinese literature, is adduced by Victor v. Strauss (p. xxxix) to prove that the ancient Chinese regarded the Tao as a sentient being that is possessed of a heart. He translates "Des Menschen Herz ist gefahrvoll, Tao's Herz ist fein, ist lauter, ist eins. Wollt euch erhalten in ihm." His interpretation of Tao hsün, which reflects his theosophical preferences, is against the sense in which the passage is commonly quoted (see the K'anghi s. v. Tao, Vol. 34, p. 21 B). The last sentence "Wollt euch erhalten in ihm" instead of "Thus it keeps its middle" is undoubtedly a mistake. Otherwise Strauss's translation is not incorrect. But what shall we say of Legge who (in the S. B. of the E., Vol. III., p. 50) translates this same passage: "The mind of man is restless, prone (to err); its affinity to what is right is small. Be discriminating, be uniform (in the pursuit of what is right), that you may sincerely hold fast the Mean?"

The Tao is a principle, not a personal being; it is an omnipresent feature of reality, a law fashioning things and events, not a god, nor an essence or a world-substance. Nevertheless, Taoists personify it and use the term as if it were a synonym of God. Thus Lao-Tze himself speaks of the Tao as 天下母 (t'ien hsia mu), "the world-mother,"<sup>1</sup> or 萬物之母 (wan wu chih mu), "mother of the ten thousand things,"<sup>2</sup> and calls it 宗 (tsung), the ancestor, and 君 (chün), the master,<sup>3</sup> viz., the ultimate authority of the philosopher's words and deeds.

Chwang-Tze speaks of the Tao as "the author of all transformations in whom there is no element of falsehood" (Book V.). Besides, he calls the Tao "the great and most honored Master" (Book VI).

Lao-Tze mentions the word 帝 (Ti), God, only once (Chap. 4)<sup>4</sup>, calling him 萬物宗 (wan wu tsung), "the ancestor" or "arch-father of the ten thousand things." But while Lao-Tze distinguishes God from the Tao and claims that the Tao takes precedence before God, his disciples identify the Tao with God and have coined a special designation 真宰 (Chen-Tsai)<sup>5</sup>, i. e., the True Ruler,—a term which is the common appellation of God among Taoists even to-day.

THE IDEAL OF LAO-TZE'S ETHICS.

德

UPON his faith in the seasonableness, goodness, and unfailing rightness of the Tao, Lao-Tze builds his ethical system, trusting that through the Tao the crooked shall be straightened, the imperfect shall be made complete, the lowly shall receive abundance as sure as valleys naturally and without any effort of their own fill themselves with water. Thus the Tao resembles water.<sup>1</sup> Lao-Tze demands the surrender of personal ambition and all selfish strivings. His aim is not to fashion, not to make, not to push or force things, but to let them develop according to their own nature.

Virtue, according to Lao-Tze, is simply the imitation of the Tao. The Tao acts, but does not claim; it begets and quickens, but does not own; it directs and arranges, but does not rule.<sup>2</sup> The sage will not make a show of virtue, of benevolence, of justice, of propriety; his virtue is 不德 (pu teh), or unvirtue.<sup>3</sup> He will make no pretense of being virtuous, but simply imitate in all things Heaven's Tao. In a word, the ideal of morality consists in realising 無名之朴 (wu ming chih p'u), the simplicity of the Ineffable, of the nameless or unnamable Tao.

Thus, according to Lao-Tze, he who acts a part in the world, as a player does on the stage; he who endeavors to bring about artificial conditions; he who meddles with the natural growth of society, will fail in the end, and virtue is simply 無爲 (wu-wei),<sup>1</sup> or "not acting, not making, not doing." Non-action or wu wei cannot mean inactivity, for it is with Lao-Tze a principle of action. He never tires preaching 爲無爲 (wei wu wei),<sup>2</sup> i. e., to act non-action; he expressly declares that "an able man acts resolutely" (chap. 30); and he assures us (chaps. 37 and 48) that: 無爲而無不爲 (wu wei er wu pu wei), "through non-action everything can be accomplished."

Lao-Tze's propositions "to act non-action" and "to accomplish everything by non-action," appear paradoxical, but his idea is simple enough. He who attempts to alter the nature of things will implicate himself in a struggle in which even the most powerful creature must finally succumb. But he who uses things according to their nature, directing their course, not forcing them or trying to alter their nature, can do with them whatever he pleases. Build strong walls and heavy dams to prevent the landslide caused by the waters that sink into the ground, and the waters will break through and carry your dam down into the valley; but provide the under-ground water with outlets in the places where it naturally endeavors to flow, and there will be no danger of a catastrophe.

The same is true of the social conditions of mankind. Lao-Tze requests the government not to govern, but simply to administer. Rulers should not interfere with the natural development of their people, but practise not-acting, not-meddling, non-interference, or, as the French call it, laissez faire, so that the people shall scarcely know that they have rulers. The less laws and prohibitions there are, the less crime will there be. The less the welfare of the people is forced by artificial methods, the greater will be their wealth and prosperity.

Lao-Tze's principle of "not-acting" is accordingly not inactivity; it is simply not acting a part; not doing things in an artificial way; it is not forcing the nature of things. The term 無爲 (wu wei) is best explained by its synonym 無欲 (wu yü), i. e., "being without desire." Man is requested not to have a will of his own, but to do what according to the eternal and immutable order of things he ought to do. It is the surrender of attachment to self, and the utter omission of 人道 (jhren tao), i. e., of man's Tao, the peculiar and particular Tao of oneself and following the course prescribed by the eternal Tao, 常道 (ch'ang tao). It is, briefly, not "non-action," but "non-assertion," and this is the translation by which wu-wei is rendered in the present translation as coming nearest to the original meaning.

Chwang-Tze, Lao-Tze's most accomplished disciple, characterises wu-wei, or non-action, as follows:

"Non-action makes one the lord of all glory; non-action makes one the treasury of all plans; non-action makes one the burden of all offices; non-action makes one the lord of all wisdom. The range of the true man's action is inexhaustible, but there is nowhere any trace of his presence. He fulfils all that he has received from Heaven, but he does not see that he was the recipient of anything. A pure vacancy (of his own and private affairs) characterises him. When the perfect man employs his mind, it is a mirror. It conducts nothing and anticipates nothing; it responds, but does not retain. Thus he is able to deal successfully with all things and injures none."

無爲 (wu-wei) is the condition of genuine virtue. It leads to 朴 (p'u) or 樸 (p'u), simplicity, to 虛心 (hsü hsin), emptiness of heart, to 質 (chih), sincerity to 清 (ch'ing), or 清淨 (ch'ing-ching), and 淳 (ch'un) purity, to 貞 (cheng), righteousness, to 素 (su), plainness, to 眞 (chen), truth,<sup>1</sup> and the application of Lao-Tze's ethics is tersely expressed in the sentence: 報怨以德 (pau yuen i teh) "Recompense hatred with goodness." (Chap. 63.)

Lao-Tze further characterises his ethics as 復歸 (fuh kwei), "wending home," or 反 (fan)<sup>2</sup>, "reverting"<sup>3</sup> 歸根 (kwei ken), returning to the root. We read in Chapter 40: 反者道之動 (fan che, tao chih tung), "returning is the Tao's movement;" and by reverting homeward is meant rest. There is no idea (except perhaps the ideas of simplicity and purity) on which Lao-Tze dwells with more emphasis than upon the ideal of pacification, which he calls 靜 (ch'ing), stillness,<sup>4</sup> and 安 (ngan), 平 (p'ing), 泰 (t'ai), i. e., peace, equanimity, and ease.<sup>5</sup> (Chapter 35.)

D.*, pp. 620, 701, 848; the character ngan consists of the radicals "shelter" and "woman," signifying the contentment of being at home, which is the place where a woman is sheltered. P'ing (representing scales in equilibrium) means ease, tranquillity, satisfaction, and t'ai is composed of "water," and "great," denoting: (1) that which is slippery; (2) that which is in abundance; and (3) that which moves without friction.

The ideal of non-action as the basis of ethics in the sense in which Lao-Tze understands it, is very different from the expressions and moral preachings that the Western people, the energetic children of the North, are accustomed to. Nevertheless, there are remarkable coincidences with Lao-Tze's ethics not only in Buddhism but also in the Bible and the literature of Western saints and sages.

The virtue of the Taoist, which is "tranquillity," "quietude," "rest," corresponds to the Biblical injunction: "Rest in the Lord!" (Psalm, 37, 7) and "In quietude and in confidence shall be your strength!" (Isaiah, 30, 15), or, as the Apostle has it: "We beseech you, brethren, that ye study to be quiet."

This tranquillity, if acquired by all, would become peace on earth to the men of good-will.

The Bible characterises God in words that would have been very congenial to Lao-Tze. We read:

"He maketh wars to cease unto the end of the earth; he breaketh the bow and cutteth the spear in sunder; he burneth the chariot in the fire." (Ps. 46, 9.)

And the ethics of this God, who is the ideal of peace on earth, is stillness. The Psalmist continues:

"Be still and know that I am God."

That God should be conceived as non-action was a favorite idea of Philo, the Neo-Platonist, the same who for the first time used the term Logos in the sense in which it was adopted by the author of the Fourth Gospel. Philo calls God ἄποιος, the non-actor, not in the sense of being passive but as absolute existence, tion, i. e., a state of ease. Thus ngan is peace as opposed to strife; p'ing equilibrium, as opposed to an unbalanced state; t'ai, smoothness, as opposed to irritation.

as the ὄντως ὄν. Indeed, "activity is as natural to God as burning is to fire" (Leg. all., I, 3), but God's activity is of a peculiar kind; it is efficiency, not exertion; it is not a particular work that he performs, but an omnipresent effectiveness which Philo finds difficult to characterise without falling a prey to mysticism. Philo was a mystic, and God to him is the Unnamable and Unspeakable, ἀνατονόμαστος καὶ ἄρρητος, which is the same as 無名 (wu ming).

Stillness, that is to say, self-possessed tranquillity, or quietude of soul is the condition of purity. Anything that agitates the mind disturbs it, for troubled waters cannot be limpid. Chwang-Tze says:

"Sadness and pleasure show a depraving element in virtue; joy and anger show some error in their course; love and hatred show a failure of their virtue. . . . It is the nature of water, when free from admixture, to be clear, and, when not agitated, to be level; while, if obstructed and not allowed to flow, it cannot preserve its clearness;—being an image of the virtue of Heaven. Hence it is said to be guileless and pure, and free from all admixture; to be still and uniform, without undergoing any change; to be indifferent and not self-asserting; to move and yet to act like Heaven:—this is the way to nourish the spirit."

Christianity and Buddhism are classified by Schopenhauer as the religions of pessimism, because they recognise the existence of evil in the world from which we must seek salvation, and in addition to several other similarities the Taoist philosophy would fall under the same category. Chwang-Tze lets the robber Chi express his view on happiness in these words which apparently voice the author's opinion:

"The greatest longevity man can reach is a hundred years; a medium longevity is eighty years; the lowest longevity is sixty. Take away sickness, pining, bereavement, mourning, anxieties, and calamities, the times when, in any of these, one can open his mouth and laugh, are only four or five days in a month. Heaven and earth have no limit of duration, but the death of man has its (appointed) time."

The world is full of anxiety and misery; and salvation consists solely in a surrender of that selfish craving for pleasures which, in common people, is the main-spring of action.

Lao-Tze's ethics of returning, and becoming quiet, remind us of Isaiah's word: "In returning and rest shall ye be saved." (30, 15.)

And the Psalmist says: "Return unto thy rest, O my soul." (116, 7.)

The Taoist term 虛心 (hsü hsin), i. e., emptiness of heart, reminds us of the poor in spirit.

Lao-Tze insists on faith as much as St. Paul, saying:

"He whose faith is insufficient shall receive no faith." (17, 23.)

Further Lao-Tze says (Chapters 43 and 78):

"The softest overcomes the world's hardest."

"The weak conquer the strong, the tender conquer the rigid."

St. Paul uses the same expression:

"God hath chosen the weak things of the world to confound the things which are mighty." (1 Cor., 1, 27.)

"When I am weak then I am strong." (2 Cor., 12, 10.)

"My (God's) strength is made perfect in weakness." (Ib., v. 9.)

As the Tao is the same to all people, so the sage is the same to all people. He makes no discrimination. Lao-Tze says: 善者吾善之 不善者吾亦善之 (shan che wu shan chih; puh shan che wu yih shan chih!) "The good I meet with goodness; the not-good I meet also with goodness!" (Chapter 49.)

Since genuine merit can be accomplished only through non-assertion, the condition of greatness is modesty or lowliness. As the water that benefits all the world seeks always the lowest places, so the sage abhors self-exaltation. As Christ says, "Whosoever shall exalt himself shall be abased," and "he that shall humble himself shall be exalted," so Lao-Tze compares the Tao of Heaven to a bow (Chapter 77); he says: "It brings down the high and exalts the lowly." Lao-Tze says that the imperfect will be restored, the crooked shall be straightened, the valleys shall be filled (Chapter 20), which reminds one of the words of Isaiah (40, 4):

"Every valley shall be exalted, and every mountain and hill shall be made low: and the crooked shall be made straight and the rough places plain."

Christian philosophers of the Middle Ages, especially the Mystics, present even more striking analogies to Lao-Tze's terminology than St. Paul. As Lao-Tze speaks of "Tao's course" as a "regress" or "a return homeward" (Chapter 40), and of man's necessity of "returning to the root," so Scotus Erigena in his book De divisione naturæ, 519 D, declares:

"Deus in unum colligit omnia et ad se ipsum ineffabili regressu resolvitur." [God gathers all in one and resolves them in Himself in an ineffable regress.]

Master Eckhart's sermons contain many passages that might have been written by Lao-Tze; so especially his praise of the virtue of simplicity, which he calls Einvaltekeit (edition Pfeiffer, II., 600, 31), his recommendation of quietude and rest, which he calls rouwe (ibid. 601, 4) the importance which he attributes to unity which he calls eineheit (ibid., 517 L), and his identification of the highest height with the deepest depth of humility (ibid., 574, 22 and 26).

There is no doubt, the Taoists could claim Eckhart as one of their own.

Johannes Scheffler, called Angelus Silesius, a born Protestant, who was so much affected by mystic sentiment that he turned Roman Catholic, says :

"Wir beten : 'Es gescheh', mein Herr und Gott, dein Wille, Und sieh, Er hat nicht Will', Er ist ein' ew'ge Stille."

["Thy will be done O Lord, my God !" we pray,
But lo ! God has no will ; stillness he is for aye.]

"Ruh' ist das höchste Gut, und wäre Gott nicht Ruh', Ich schlosse vor Ihm selbst mein' Augen beide zu."

[Rest is the highest good ; indeed were God not rest ;
I'd turn away from Him, as being no longer blest.]

The Tao-Teh-King exercised a strong influence on Tolstoi.<sup>1</sup> He, too, speaks of non-action, le non-agir. Labor, in his opinion, is no virtue ; labor is useless, nay, pernicious, for labor, such as keeps men too busy to leave them time for thought, is the curse of the world. Most of us, says Tolstoi, have not time for the consideration of truth and goodness, because we are rushed. An editor must arrange his journal, the general organises his troops, the engineer constructs an Eiffel tower, men of affairs arrange the World's Fair, the naturalist investigates heredity, the philologist must count the frequency of various phrases in certain authors, and no one has leisure enough for a moment of rest ; no one has time for finding that peace of soul which the world cannot give. They do anything except that which they ought to do first.

Tolstoi is right, for thinking reforms the world, not laboring. Thought is the rudder that changes the course of the ship of toiling mankind; the energy of the steam that labors in turning the wheels is useful only so long as it is controlled by thought in the right way. For acquiring the right ideal that will guide us in the right direction, we need not labor, nor need we exert ourselves, on the contrary, says Tolstoi, we must abandon all exertion and become calm. If all men would only employ the tenth part of the energy that is wasted on the acquisition of purely material advantages, to settling the questions of their conscience, the world would soon be reformed.

A peculiar parallelism of Lao-Tze's Taoism with Christianity consists in Lao-Tze's belief in an original state of innocence and paradisial happiness. He attributes all the evils that now prevail to a deviation from the original simplicity enjoined by the eternal Tao. The conscious discrimination between good and evil, the studied wisdom of the age, the prevailing method of teaching virtue which does not make men good, but merely induces them to be hypocritical, the constant interference of the government with the affairs of the people are the causes of all disorders. His ideal state would be a return to the paradisial innocence and simplicity, a society of simple-minded people who seek their happiness at home. (Chapter 80.)

There are many more remarkable passages in the Tao-Teh-King, such as the trinity in unity (Chapter 42); the preservation of him who will not perish when he dies (Chapter 33); that the weak conquer the strong (Chapter 43); that we must become like little children (Chapter 28 and 55); that the holy man knows himself as a child of the Tao (Chapter 52); that the Tao can be had for the mere seeking for it (Chapter 63); that the son of heaven (viz., the king or emper-ror) must bear the sins of the people (Chapter 78), etc.; but we must leave them to the reader who will find enough in Lao-Tze's little book that will set him to thinking.

The natural result of Lao-Tze's philosophy is the ethical ideal of the sage, the saintly man, 聖人 (sheng jhren),<sup>1</sup> who is also called 君子 (chiün tze), the superior sage, or, as later Taoists have it, 真人 (chen jhren), the Truth-Man, i. e., the man of truth or the true man.

Chwang-Tze says (Book XV.):

"The human spirit goes forth in all directions, flowing on without limit, reaching to heaven above, and wreathing round the earth beneath. It transforms and nourishes all things, and cannot be represented by any form. Its name is "Divinity (in man)." It is only the path of pure simplicity which guards and preserves the Spirit. When this path is preserved and not lost, it becomes one with the Spirit; and in this ethereal amalgamation it acts in harmony with the orderly operation of Heaven.

"There is a common saying, 'The multitude of men consider gain to be the most important thing; pure scholars, fame; those who are wise and able value their ambition; the sage prizes essential purity.' Therefore simplicity is the denomination of that in which there is no admixture; purity of that in which the spirit is not impaired. It is he who can embody simplicity and purity whom we call the True Man." Sacred Books of the East, XXXIX., p. 367.

An exhaustive description of the True Man is given by Chwang-Tze in Book VI., where we read:

"What is meant by 'the True Man'?

"The True men of old did not reject (the views of) the few; they did not seek to accomplish (their ends) like heroes (before others); they did not lay plans to attain those ends. Being such, though they might make mistakes, they had no occasion for repentance; though they might succeed, they had no self-complacency. Being such, they could ascend the loftiest heights without fear; they could pass through water without being made wet by it; they could go into fire without being burnt; so it was that by their knowledge they ascended to and reached the Tao.

"The True men of old did not dream when they slept, had no anxiety when they awoke, and did not care that their food should be pleasant. Their breathing came deep and silently.

"When men are defeated in argument, their words come from their gullets as if they were vomiting. Where lusts and desires are deep, the springs of the Heavenly are shallow.

"The True men of old knew nothing of the love of life or of the hatred of death. Entrance into life occasioned them no joy; the exit from it awakened no resistance. Composedly they went and came. They did not forget what their beginning had been, and they did not inquire into what their end would be. They accepted their lot and rejoiced in it; they forgot fear of death and returned to their state before life. Thus there was in them what is called the want of any mind to resist the Tao, and of all attempts by means of the Human to assist the Heavenly. Such were they who are called the True men.

"The True men of old presented the aspect of judging others aright, but without being partisans; of feeling their own insufficiency, but being without flattery or cringing. Their peculiarities were natural to them, but they were not obstinately attached to them; their humility was evident, but there was nothing of unreality or display about it." Ibid., p. 237, 238, 240.

Lao-Tze declares that the True Man is not hurt by fire or water, and that he need not fear either the rhinoceros or tiger, which is explained by Chwang-Tze in Book XVII.:

"Fire cannot burn him who is perfect in virtue, nor water drown him; neither cold nor heat can affect him injuriously; neither bird nor beast can hurt him. This does not mean that he is indifferent to these things; it means that he discriminates between where he may safely rest and where he will be in peril; that he is tranquil equally in calamity and happiness; that he is careful what he avoids and what he approaches;—so that nothing can injure him. Hence it is said: 'What is heavenly is internal; what is human is external.'

"Virtue is in what is heavenly. If you know the operation of what is heavenly and what is human, you will have your root in what is heavenly and your position in virtue." Ibid., p. 383.

The sage is above death; he is one with the Tao:

"Death and life are great considerations, but they could work no change in him. Though heaven and earth were to be overturned and fall, they would occasion him no loss. His judgment is fixed on that in which there is no element of falsehood; and, while other things change, he changes not. The transformations of things are to him the developments prescribed for them, and he keeps fast hold of the author of them."

The same ideas are expressed by Horace in his ode Integer vitæ (I., 22) in which the Roman poet praises the perfect and faultless man who needs no arms of any description, who may roam through mountain wildernesses without fear of the wolf and will not suffer from the heat of the desert. Horace exclaims in another ode that the virtuous man would remain firm even if the world broke down upon him: "Si fractus illabatur orbis, impavidum ferient ruinae."

It was natural that in the course of the further development of the Taoist movement the old philosopher was more and more regarded as the True Man, beside whom all the others were mere aspirants for saintliness. His life was adorned with tales which remind us of Buddhist legends, and he became the central figure of a triune deity called the Three Pure Ones, which are even in appearance very similar to the Buddhist Trinity of the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha.

TAOISM BEFORE AND AFTER LAO-TZE.

QUOTATIONS IN THE TAO-TEH-KING.

LAO-TZE is commonly called the founder of Taoism, but this is a very doubtful statement, for on the one hand, there appears to have been Taoism before Lao-Tze, and, on the other hand, Lao-Tze's philosophy is too lofty to be identified with the Taoism which at the present day is practised in the innumerable temples of modern Taoism. The Taoists claim Lao-Tze as the revealer of the Tao, the divine Reason, but apparently there are few Taoist priests who are at all able to grasp the significance of the Tao-Teh-King. Lao-Tze is to the Taoists what Christ is to the Christians and Buddha to the Buddhists; but if he came unto his own, those in charge of his temples would not know him, neither would they receive him.

The existence of Taoism before Lao-Tze is evidenced by the numerous quotations, mostly in verse, which are commonly introduced with the word 故 (ku),<sup>1</sup> "therefore," which may be translated "for it is said." T'u-T'au-Kien, a commentator (quoted by Stanislas Julien, p. 133) asserts that the passages introduced by the words "Therefore the holy man says," are quoted from the Fen-tien. It is a peculiarity of Lao-Tze's that he never quotes an author by name and makes no personal allusions whatever. He is abstract in his thought as well as in his relations to mankind.

We may safely take the existence of a popular Tao-religion and also a current literature of rhymed proverbs and wise saws in the times of Lao-Tze for granted; and the ancient sages of whom he speaks appear to him deep though timid in their expressions (see chapter 15); they were hazy and lacked clearness, yet they were suggestive, and the ideas which their words suggested to him, he is inclined to attribute to them. The main purpose of his book is to make their wisdom, which none could understand, intelligible to the people. But no one who, having perused the whole Tao-Teh-King so as to be familiar with the character of Lao-Tze's thoughts, will, when rereading the fifteenth chapter, fail to understand the situation. The philosophical literature before Lao-Tze probably did not contain anything the loss of which we should have to regret, except for historical or anthropological reasons. It was confused, unintelligible, and full of mystical hints. Its morality appears to have been of a homely character, but not without practical wisdom, such as is found in the proverb literature of all nations as the natural product of the people's experience. Lao-Tze apparently poured new wine into old bottles, and gave to the sages of yore, at whose feet he had sat, more credit than they deserved.

Lao-Tze declares that emptiness is inexhaustible. The motions of the vacant space between heaven and earth do not cease, while the man of many words is soon exhausted. In this connexion he quotes (ch. 5) a Chinese doggerel, probably a proverb of his time:

"How soon exhausted is a gossip's fulsome talk!
And should we not prefer on the middle path to walk?"<sup>1</sup>

The sixth chapter contains a curious quotation<sup>2</sup> which (as says the commentator T'u-T'au-Kien) Lieh-Tze attributes to the mythical Hwang-Ti, the Yellow Emperor.<sup>3</sup> The verses may have had reference to the worship of some local deity called "the valley sprite" or "the mysterious mother." She presided over a spring which, because it never ran dry, was supposed to be a direct emanation of the root of heaven and earth. But how much more significant these homely verses become when the ever-enduring, mysterious mother is conceived to symbolise the eternal Tao!

The quotation (in Chapter 1) of the desireless who comprehends the secret meaning of things while the passionate man allows himself to be beguiled by external appearance may have had reference to a popular tale or legend similar perhaps to the story of the three caskets in Shakespeare's Merchant of Venice.

The quotation in Chapter 2, which sets forth the co-existence of contrasts and their mutual dependence is, more than to other nations, natural to the Chinese who in their word combinations use compounds of contrasts to denote what is common in both. Thus a combination of the words "to be" and "not to be" means the struggle for life or the bread question;

<sup>3</sup> Lieh-Tze's full name is Lieh-Yu-K'ow. He belongs to the generation that immediately succeeded the age of Confucius. The Yellow Emperor is commonly assigned to 2697 B. C. See Meyer's Ch. R. M., Nos. 387 and 225.

"the high and the low" means altitude; "much and little" means quantity, etc. But what originally seems to have been the trivial observation of a grammar-school teacher, acquires a philosophical meaning when embodied by Lao-Tze into the Tao-Teh-King.

These are mere guesses at the original meanings of some of Lao-Tze's quotations; they may be right, they may be wrong; who can tell? But the quotations seem to my mind to tell their own story.

Some quotations, such as those in chapters 13, 14, 27, 29, 39, 44, 54, 73, and even the remarkable lines in 78, are simple enough and need no explanation; the quotations in chapt. 12 smack of Chinese schools. The first three lines remind us of sentences contained in the San-Tze-King<sup>1</sup> (the classic of three characters), and the other two lines reflect the practical spirit of the Chinese way of moralising. Others (such as in Chapters 2 [the last lines], 4 [repeated in 56], 13, 17, 19, 21, 23, 28, 35, 37, 40, 41, 42, 44, 45, 47) are so peculiarly characteristic of Lao-Tze that we feel inclined to believe that they were either written by the author of the Tao-Teh-King himself, or adapted by him through a slight change in words to their present use, for it is more than probable that the author of the Tao-Teh-King was himself a poet of hymns and of philosophical contemplations. If he shows at an advanced age so much emotion and also love of poetry, how could he in his younger years have abstained from expressing his sentiments in verse? Moreover, the frequent repetitions<sup>1</sup> in the Tao-Teh-King prove

"Quickens but owns not, works but claims not," 2, 10, 51, partly repeated in 77.—The verses "Blunts its own sharpness" etc., are quoted twice, 4 and 56.—"Quarrelleth (or striveth) not" is repeated with variations in 8, 22, 66, 81.—"Attends to the inner, not to the outer, abandons the latter and chooses the that he was inclined to quote sayings of his own. However, one of Lao-Tze's most remarkable quotations, found in Chapter 22, is expressly stated to be a saying of the ancients, and Lao-Tze adds that it "was not vainly spoken."

The quotations in the Tao-Teh-King do not prove a lack of originality in Lao-Tze, but they are unequivocal evidences of aspirations before Lao-Tze, which, although less definite, tended in the same direction.

LAO-TZE AND CONFUCIUS.

Taoism is at present, and probably was from time immemorial, certainly long before Lao-Tze, a religion of China. But it is not the only religion; it is one of the three great religions that are officially recognised. Besides Taoism, there is Buddhism and Confucianism. There is a rivalry between Buddhism and Taoism, for Buddhism and Taoism present many similarities; but between Taoism and Confucianism there has obtained since olden times an outspoken antagonism, for Lao-Tze's philosophy stands in strong contrast to the Confucian view of life. We do not speak now of the objections which educated Chinese scholars who hold high offices in the State have to the superstitions that obtain among the less educated former," 12, 38, 72.—"He whose faith is insufficient shall receive no faith," 17, 23.—"He that makes wars," etc., 29, 64.—"Asserts non-assertion," 3, 37, 48.—"This is called unreason; unreason soon ceases," 30, 55.—"One who has reason has nothing to do therewith," 24, 31.—"If princes and king could keep reason," etc., 32, 37.—"With non-diplomacy he takes the empire," 48, 58.—"Closes his mouth and shuts his sense-gates," 52, 56.—"Thus he becomes world-honored," 56, 62.—"Therefore even the holy man regards it as difficult," 63, 73.

Taoist priesthood and also against the religious frauds that are frequently practised in the name of Taoism. We simply speak of the antagonism that obtains between the two sages and their moral maxims.

While 老子 (Lao-Tze) endeavored to reform the heart of the people without moralising or fussing, and left all externalities to fate, 孔子 (K'ung-Tze) or Confucius, proposed to teach propriety. If the people would only observe the necessary rules and ceremonies prescribed by piety and good manners, he expected that all human relations would adjust themselves, and the heart would be reformed by a reform of the habits of life. While Lao-Tze was self-reliant and almost solitary in his way of thinking,<sup>1</sup> Confucius sought the favor of kings and princes. While Lao-Tze stood up for natural spontaneity and independence, Confucius represented paternalism. While Lao-Tze was an anarchist, not in the sense of being against kings, but against governing, Confucius was a monarchist and a regulator of affairs in their details, endeavoring to extend the government into the very hearts of families and the private affairs of the people.

Further, Lao-Tze with all his clearness of thought had a mystic inclination. He wanted wisdom, not scholarship; Confucius wanted scholarship and hoped to gain wisdom by learning. Lao-Tze wanted simplicity of heart, not decorum; Confucius expected to affect the heart by the proper decorum. Confucius preferred conscious deportment, the product of artificial schooling, but Lao-Tze wanted goodness raised in freedom.

Under such conditions it was natural that there could be but little sympathy between Lao-Tze and

K'ung-Tze, the two greatest leaders of Chinese civilisation, who happened to be contemporaries. Indeed, the Tao-Teh-King contains passages which must be interpreted as direct criticisms of the views of Confucius.<sup>1</sup>

Sze-Ma-Ch'ien's story of Lao-Tze's life which has been incorporated in the present edition of the Tao-Teh-King contains the report of Confucius's interview with the old philosopher, which, for all we know, may be an historical fact. We possess another account of the same meeting by Chwang-Tze (Book XIV, § 6), which, however, although older, can in its lengthier details scarcely be considered more reliable, for Chwang-Tze writes as a litterateur, while Sze-Ma-Ch'ien is conscious of the historian's duties. We need not reproduce Chwang-Tze's account, because it has become accessible through the translations of Victor von Strauss and James Legge.<sup>2</sup>

The Taoist writers are in the habit of censuring bitterly both Confucius and the Confucian scholars, the literati, who down to the present day fill the offices of the Chinese government. The best instances of Taoistic satires are the stories of the madman of Ch'u who rebukes Confucius for his ostentatious manners; the old fisherman who lectures him on simplicity; and the robber Chi who criticises his views on ethics.<sup>3</sup>

The last-mentioned story, viz., of the robber Chi, seems of sufficient interest to deserve a few further remarks. To be brave and courageous and to be a leader of men in battle is, according to Confucius, the lowest virtue, while offering sacrifices to one's ancestors is the greatest merit one can accomplish. The robber Chi rejects the views of Confucius as the arbitrary opinion of an arrogant hypocrite whose lack of success in life proves his inability; and he explains to him that neither he, Confucius himself, nor any one of the old heroes admired by him, were truly virtuous men. Chwang-Tze, in telling the story, claims that the proper procedure in life cannot be laid down in general rules, such as Confucius propounds, but that every creature has its own nature, and every business has its own principles. He only who applies them as suits the peculiar conditions of each case can be successful. He looks upon the virtuous and unvirtuous man of Confucian ethics as an artificial distinction which has no value and is rather a hindrance in real life; at least one prince who followed his maxims lost throne and life. As to principles, however, even robbers must adopt them in order to be successful. Says Chwang-Tze :

"What profession is there which has not its principles? That the robber in his recklessness comes to the conclusion that there are valuable deposits in an apartment shows his sageness; that he is the first to enter it shows his bravery; that he is the last to quit it shows his righteousness; that he knows whether (the robbery) may be attempted or not shows his wisdom; and that he makes a division of the plunder shows his benevolence. Without all these five qualities no one in the world has ever succeeded in becoming a great robber. Looking at the subject in this way, we see that good men do not arise without having the principles of sages, and that Chih could not have pursued his course without the same principles. But the good men in the world are few, and those who are not good are many;—it follows that the scholars (viz., the Confucian literati) benefit the world in a few instances and injure it in many."

Lao-Tze's ethics were rejected by the schools, but the doctrine of Confucius appealed to the rulers of China on account of its apparent practicability and became thus the established philosophy of the empire. How much different would the development of China have been had Lao-Tze in the place of Confucius exercised the dominating influence upon the thought of the people !

TAOISM AFTER LAO-TZE.

Although the Tao-Teh-King is no popular book, its author, the old philosopher gained, nevertheless, the universal admiration of the masses ; but it is natural that the people's Taoism differs greatly from Lao-Tze's Taoism, for while Lao-Tze opposed learnedness and the pretentious show of scholarship, popular Taoism is reported to oppose all learning and with it genuine science and true wisdom.

There is no place in China but has one or more Taoist temples, and at the head of all of them stands the Taoist pope, the vicegerent of God on earth. Professor Legge says :

"Taoism came into prominence under the government of the Han dynasty, and it is recorded that the Emperor Ching (156-143 B. C.) issued an imperial decree that Lao-Tze's book on the Tao and the Teh, on Reason and Virtue, should be respected as a canonical book or King, hence its title Tao-Teh-KING."

Among the Taoist literature, the books of Chwang-Tze are the most philosophical, while the Book of Rewards and Punishments (Kan-Ying-P'ien) and the Book of Secret Blessings (Yin-Chih-Wen) are the most popular. Chwang-Tze's writings are a noteworthy monument of deep thought in elegant form, and the two other works are moral injunctions which in the Kan-Ying-P'ien are illustrated by stories that bring home to the reader the need of charitableness, piety, universal kindness, and other virtues.<sup>1</sup>

When Buddhism was introduced into China, the Taoists invented legends to prove that Lao-Tze had been the teacher of Buddha, and the Buddhists reciprocated by inventing other legends to prove that Buddha had been the teacher of Lao-Tze. In order to make these claims good they had, however, to alter their chronology, and this is the reason why Buddha's life dates considerably further back according to the Northern traditions than is warranted by the original historical records.

Later Taoists became engaged in the search for the elixir of life, the transmutation of baser metals into gold, and similar aberrations. They were sometimes persecuted by the government, sometimes protected, but they always remained a great power in China on account of the belief of the common people, who never failed to employ and support Taoist priests as soothsayers and astrologers.

When in 208 B. C. the founder of the Han dynasty, Lin Pang, then still the Duke of Pei, took possession of the Empire, he was greatly aided by Chang Liang, who opposed the last successors of the Ts'in dynasty; but when peace was restored Chang-Liang refused to accept any rewards and withdrew, devoting himself to the study of Taoism. A descendant of this hero in the eighth generation became the patron of the Taoist sect. Mayers (in his Chinese Reader's Manual, I., No. 35) says about him :

<sup>1</sup>The Kan-Ying-Pien has been translated into French by Stanislaus Julien under the title Le Livre des Récompenses et des Peines, etc. Paris and London. 1835. For a good account of both the Kan-Ying-Pien and the Yin-Tzu-Wen see Prof. R. K. Douglas's Confucianism and Taoism. London. 1889. Pp., 256-274.

"He is reputed as having been born at T'ien Muh Shan, in the modern province of Chekiang, and is said at the age of seven to have already mastered the writings of Lao-Tze and the most recondite treatises relating to the philosophy of divination. Devoting himself wholly to study and meditation, he steadfastly declined the offers made him by the Emperors Ho Ti and Chang Ti, who wished to attract him into the service of the State. The latter sovereign ennobled him, from respect for his attainments. Retiring to seclusion in the mountain fastnesses of Western China, he devoted himself there to the study of alchemy and to cultivating the virtues of purity and mental abstraction. His search for the elixir of life was successful, thanks to the instruction conveyed in a mystic treatise supernaturally received from the hands of Lao-Tze himself. The later years of the mystic's earthly experience were spent at the mountain called Lung Hu Shan in Kiangsi, and it was here that, at the age of 123, after compounding and swallowing the grand elixir, he ascended to the heavens to enjoy the bliss of immortality. Before taking leave of earth, he bequeathed his secrets to his son, Chang-Heng, and the tradition of his attainments continued to linger about the place of his abode until, in A. D. 423, one of his sectaries, named K'ow K'ien-che, was proclaimed as his successor in the headship of the Taoist fraternity and invested with the title of T'ien-She, which was reputed as having been conferred upon Chang Tao-Ling. In A. D. 748, T'ang Hsuan Tsung confirmed the hereditary privileges of the sage's descendants with the above title, and in 1016, Sung Chen Tsung enfeoffed the existing representative with large tracts of land near Lung Hu Shan.<sup>1</sup> The Mongol emperors were also liberal patrons of the family, who have continued until the present day to claim the headship of the Taoist sect. In imitation, probably, of the Tibetan doctrine of heirship by metempsychosis, the succession is perpetuated, it is said, by the transmigration of the soul of each successor of Chang Tao-Ling, on his decease, to the body of some infant or youthful member of the family, whose heirship is supernaturally revealed as soon as the miracle is effected."

"The name of Chang, the Heavenly Teacher, is on every lip in China; he is on earth the Vicegerent of the Pearly Emperor in Heaven, and the Commander-in-chief of the hosts of Taoism. Whatever doubts there may be about Peter's apostolic successors, the present Pope, Chang LX., boasts of an unbroken line for three-score generations. He, the chief of the wizards, the "true man" (i. e., "the ideal man"), as he is called, and wields an immense spiritual power throughout the land."

The present emperor respects the rights of the hereditary Taoist Pope and makes all his appointments of new deities or new titles conferred upon Gods or any other changes in the spiritual world through this head of the Taoist sect, whose power is based not only upon wealth, nor upon his priestly army of one hundred thousand men alone, but also and mainly on the reverence of the masses who are convinced of his magical accomplishments and spiritual superiority.

When the reader has finished reading the Tao-Teh-King, so as to have in his mind a clear impression of its grand old author, let him think of the official representative of Lao-Tze's philosophy of the present day. Bose informs us that the scenery of his rural palace is most enchanting; he lives in pomp and luxury, has courtiers and officers, assumes a state whose splendor is scarcely less than that of any sovereign in the world, he confers honors like the emperor of China, and controls the appointments and promotions to the various positions of the Taoist priesthood, many of which are very remunerative, investments being made by written document with official seals.

What a contrast between Lao-Tze and the "vicegerent on earth of the Pearly Emperor in Heaven"! And yet, is it not quite natural? Should we expect it different? It is the world's way of paying its tribute to greatness.

THE PRESENT EDITION OF THE TAO-TEH-KING.

CONCERNING the manuscripts of the Tao-Teh-King, Prof. Stanislas Julien translates the following passage from a Chinese authority:<sup>1</sup>

"The text of Lao-Tze known under the title of Hiang-in-tsie pen was found in the tomb of Hiang-in in the fifth year of the period of Wu-p'ing of the Northern T'si dynasty (which is the year 574 A. D.), by an inhabitant of the village of Pong. The text called Ngan-k'ien-wang-pen was found by a Tau-sse named Keu-tsien in the period of T'ai-ho of the Wei (which is in our chronology the years 475 and 500 A. D.). The text of the Ho-shang-kong was handed down through Kieu-yo, a sage of the kingdom of T'si. Each of these three texts contain 5,722 words. The passages quoted from Lao-Tze by the philosopher Han-fei are found therein exactly and without variations. There was an official text at Lo-yang called Kuan-pen containing 5,630 words. The text Wang-pi (the commentary of which was composed under the Wei, and according to others under the Tsin), contains 5,683 words, and in certain editions 5,610 words."

Chao-Hong reports that there are sixty-four editions of the Tao-Teh-King. It has been commentated by twenty Taoists, seven Buddhists, and thirty-four literati.

The present text-edition is based upon a compari-

The first translation that was made of the Tao-Teh-King by Western scholars is in Latin. It was made by the Roman Catholic missionaries.<sup>2</sup> Considering the difficulties that had to be overcome, this first venture appears to have been remarkably good, but it is now superseded by the first French translation made by Professor Stanislas Julien.

Julien's edition is very carefully made and may still be regarded as the most diligent and comprehensive work of its kind. It contains the Chinese text mainly based upon Edition E of the Royal Library of Paris. Another French translation has been made by C. De Harlez and is published in the Annales du Musée Guimet, Vol. XX. It is based on a careful revision of the text and commentaries. It contains some new interpretations, but enters little into textual criticisms, and as it serves another purpose, it does not render Stanislas Julien's edition antiquated.

Chalmers's translation is, so far as we know, the first English version. It is very readable and agrees closely with Stanislas Julien's translation but stands in need of a revision. As Chalmers's booklet appeared in a limited edition, it is now out of print, and I could only with difficulty procure a second-hand copy. James Legge's translation, which appeared in the <sup>1</sup> Feng means "to meet unexpectedly" (Williams, S. D., p. 158), while p'eng is "a species of rubus or raspberry, growing sporadically among hemp"; also described as "a weed that the wind roots up and drives across the wastes."—Williams spells p'ang and fäng.

<sup>2</sup> Not being in possession of a copy I have not been able to consult it.

Sacred Books of the East, Vol. XXXIX., is no great improvement on Chalmers's translation; on the contrary, it is in several respects disappointing. With its many additions in parentheses, it makes the impression of being quite literal, while in fact it is a loose rendering of the original.

There is a very good German translation by Victor von Strauss, which might be better still had the translator not unduly yielded to his preconception that Lao-Tze was the representative leader of an ancient theosophical movement.

In addition we have two paraphrases of the Tao-Teh-King, one in German by Reinhold von Plaenckner, the other in English by Major-General G. G. Alexander. Plaenckner deviates greatly in his conception of Lao-Tze from all other translators, and is very bitter in denouncing Stanislas Julien especially. Alexander's main contention is to translate the word Tao by God.

For the present translation I have freely availed myself of the labors of my predecessors, to whom I hereby express my gratitude publicly. Most valuable of all has proved to be Prof. Stanislas Julien's work.

Five dictionaries have been used, (1) the Syllabic Dictionary of the Chinese Language by Prof. S. Wells Williams, (2) The Chinese Dictionary in the Cantonese Dialect by Ernest John Eitel, (3) Kwong Ki Chin's English-Chinese Dictionary, (4) Chalmers's Concise Dictionary of Chinese on the Basis of K'anghi, and (5) the original K'anghi.<sup>1</sup> Williams's dictionary, which was in the author's possession from the beginning of his work, proved most convenient but was in many instances insufficient for the present purpose, in which case the K'anghi had to be resorted to.

In addition I am indebted to Mr. K. Tanaka, a young Japanese student of the University of Chicago, and especially to Mr. Teitaro Suzuki, a young Buddhist of Kamakura, Japan, who assisted me in both the comparison of the various editions at my command and in the transliteration of the text. Further, I have to thank Dr. Heinrich Riedel of Brooklyn, N. Y., and the Rev. George T. Candlin of Tientsin, China, for good advice and suggestions.

The purpose of the present translation is first to bring the Tao-Te-King within easy reach of everybody, and secondly to offer to the student of comparative religion a version which would be a faithful reproduction not only of the sense but of all the characteristic qualities, especially the terseness and the ruggedness of its style.

The translator's ideal was to reproduce the original in a readable form which would be as literal as the difference of languages permits and as intelligible to English-speaking people as the original ought to be to the educated native Chinese. While linguistic obscurities have been removed as much as possible, the sense has not been rendered more definite than the original would warrant. Stock phrases which are easily understood, such as, "the ten thousand things," meaning the whole world or nature collectively, have been left in their original form; but expressions which without a commentary would be unintelligible, such as "not to depart from the baggage waggon," meaning to preserve one's dignity (Chap. 26), have been replaced by the nearest terms that cover their meaning.

The versification of the quoted poetry is as literal as possible and as simple as in the original. No attempt was made to improve their literary elegance. The translator was satisfied if he could find a rhyme which would introduce either no change in the words at all or such an indifferent change as would not in the least alter the sense.

The transliteration of the several words which constitutes the fourth part of this book will enable almost everybody to fall back upon the original Chinese and to verify or revise the translation here proposed.

Comments on the text have been relegated to the critical notes. Observations which on account of their importance should be consulted also by those readers who are not interested in Chinese philology have been marked by a hand, thus . Only a few terse explanatory additions, and such only as are indispensable for an immediate elucidation of the sense, were admitted in brackets into the text.

Standing upon the shoulders of others, and having compared and re-translated the original text, the author feels confident that he can offer to the public a translation which is a sufficient improvement upon former translations to justify its publication.

It lies in the nature of this work that the number of those men who can judge of its merits and demerits is very limited. In handing the book over for publication I crave their indulgence, but, at the same time, ask them to judge of it with all the severity that would be necessary for its improvement in a second edition; for there is a need of a popular edition that will help the English-reading public to appreciate the philosophical genius and the profound religious spirit of one of the greatest men that ever trod the earth.

PRONUNCIATION AND METHOD OF TRANSCRIPTION

It must be regretted that no system of transcribing Chinese sounds has as yet been commonly accepted; nor can any of them be regarded as satisfactory. In the beginning the author of this book adopted Prof. S. Wells Williams's method exclusively, but he has allowed himself to be influenced by Gabelentz, Bridgman, Eitel, Stanislas Julien, and especially by Wade whose system appears to be much used at present. The transcription employed in the Introduction (pp. 3-47) deviates from the traditional methods only where they are positively misleading. For instance, the spelling Cho is preferred to Chou, because no unsophisticated reader would pronounce ou as long o.

The diphthong which sounds like ow in how has been so commonly transcribed by ao that Western eyes have become accustomed to the spellings lao and tao. It would now be difficult to introduce another transcription of the diphthong in lao and tao, for English readers would be puzzled with either form, low and lou; the former would probably be pronounced lo, and the latter loo. If it were transcribed, after the German fashion, lau, it would probably be pronounced law. For these reasons no change has been made in the traditional spelling of ao.

The Rev. Mr. George T. Candlin of Tientsin, China, whose advice was solicited in matters of pronunciation, writes that the vowels of all the systems that follow Wade adopt the continental pronunciation of vowels. However, o sounds somewhat like oak, and ou has the sound of o in "alone."

As to the sound which is transcribed by Williams and Wade by j, and declared by Gabelentz to be equivalent to the French j, (e. g., in je le jure, which would be the English zh), Mr. Candlin writes: "It is an initial to which I 'have given much attention, and if I had to choose I would simply write r instead of j. The fact is, if you listen to a Celestial you hear distinctly the 'three letters j, h, and r combined into one but the r predominant. jen = 'man,' is hardly to be distinguished from the English word 'wren'; jeu = 'flesh' is nearly 'row,' i. e., to row a boat. But jhrou would be right, as there is a suggestion of both a j and an h."

The Greek spiritus asper or an inverted comma is used to denote that strong aspirant which is characteristic of the Chinese language.

The transcription of the transliteration on pages 141-274 follows strictly Professor Williams's method, adding in each case the page of his Syllabic Dictionary of the Chinese Language on which the word will be found. The Rev. Mr. Candlin's transcription, wherever it deviated, has been added in parenthesis.

Intonation which plays an important part in the Chinese language has been neglected in transcriptions of the Introduction, where it was commendable to avoid complexities that are redundant for those who speak Chinese and would be useless and unnecessarily puzzling to all the others who do not. In the transcription of the transliteration, however, the intonation has been marked, according to the Chinese fashion, by little semicircles and dashes placed in the four corners of the word, thus: ˆ the upper monotone and ˘ the lower monotone; ˊ the rising tone, ˋ the departing tone, and ˆˊ the entering tone.

As to the printing of the Chinese text we must add that for obvious reasons commonly accepted by sinologues we have followed the usage of arranging the lines, and in quotations the words, according to the Western mode of writing, from the left to the right, not as the Chinese would have it, from the right to the left, nor starting from that page which in Western books would be the last one.

THE OLD PHILOSOPHER'S CANON ON REASON AND VIRTUE

SZE-MA-CH'EN ON LAO-TZE.

LAO-TZE was born in the hamlet Ch'ü-Jhren (Good Man's Bend), Li-Hsiang (Grinding County), K'u-Hien (Thistle District), of Ch'u (Bramble land). His family was the Li gentry (Li meaning Plum). His proper name was Er (Ear), his posthumous title Po-Yang (Prince Positive), his appellation Tan (Long-lobed). In Cho he was in charge of the secret archives as state historian.

Confucius went to Cho in order to consult Lao-Tze on the rules of propriety.

[When Confucius, speaking of propriety, praised reverence for the sages of antiquity], Lao-Tze said: "The men of whom you speak, Sir, have, if you please, together with their bones mouldered. Their words alone are still extant. If a noble man finds his time he rises, but if he does not find his time he drifts like a roving-plant and wanders about. I observe that the wise merchant hides his treasures deeply as if he were poor. The noble man of perfect virtue assumes an attitude as though he were stupid. Let go, Sir, your proud airs, your many wishes, your affectation and exaggerated plans. All this is of no use to you, Sir. That is what I have to communicate to you, and that is all."

Confucius left. [Unable to understand the basic idea of Lao-Tze's ethics], he addressed his disciples, saying: "I know that the birds can fly, I know that the fishes can swim, I know that the wild animals can run. For the running, one could make nooses; for the swimming, one could make nets; for the flying, one could make arrows. As to the dragon I cannot know how he can bestride wind and clouds when he heavenwards rises. To-day I saw Lao-Tze. Is he perhaps like the dragon?"

Lao-Tze practised reason and virtue. His doctrine aims in self-concealment and namelessness.

Lao-Tze resided in Cho most of his life. When he foresaw the decay of Cho, he departed and came to the frontier. The custom house officer Yin-Hi said: "Sir, since it pleases you to retire, I request you for my sake to write a book."

Thereupon Lao-Tze wrote a book of two parts consisting of five thousand and odd words, in which he discussed the concepts of reason and virtue. Then he departed.

No one knows where he died.

THE OLD PHILOSOPHER'S CANON ON REASON AND VIRTUE.

I.

1. REASON'S REALISATION.

THE REASON that can be reasoned is not the eternal Reason. The name that can be named is not the eternal name. The Unnameable is of heaven and earth the beginning. The Nameable becomes of the ten thousand things the mother. Therefore it is said :

“He who desireless is found
The spiritual of the world will sound.
But he who by desire is bound Sees the mere shell of things around.”

These two things are the same in source but different in name. Their sameness is called a mystery. Indeed, it is the mystery of mysteries. Of all spirituality it is the door.

2. SELF-CULTURE.

When in the world all understand beauty to be beauty, then only ugliness appears. When all understand goodness to be goodness, then only badness appears. For

“To be and not to be are mutually conditioned.
The difficult, the easy, are mutually defined.
The long, the short, are mutually exhibited.
Above, below, are mutually cognized.
The sound, the voice, are mutually coalitioned.
Before and after are mutually positioned.”

Therefore the holy man abides by non-assertion in his affairs and conveys by silence his instruction. When the ten thousand things arise, verily, he refuses them not. He quickens but owns not. He works but claims not. Merit he accomplishes, but he does not dwell on it.

“Since he does not dwell on it,
It will never leave him.”

3. KEEPING THE PEOPLE QUIET.

Not exalting worth keeps people from rivalry. Not prizing what is difficult to obtain keeps people from committing theft. Not contemplating what kindles desire keeps the heart unconfused. Therefore the holy man when he governs empties the people's hearts but fills their souls. He weakens their ambitions but strengthens their backbones. Always he keeps the people unsophisticated and without desire. He causes that the crafty do not dare to act. When he acts with non-assertion there is nothing ungoverned.

4. SOURCELESS.

Reason is empty, but its use is inexhaustible. In its profundity, verily, it resembleth the father of the ten thousand things.

“It will blunt its own sharpness,
Will its tangles adjust;
It will dim its own radiance
And be one with its dust.”

Oh, how calm it seems to remain! I know not whose son it is. Before the Lord, Reason takes precedence.

5. THE FUNCTION OF EMPTINESS.

Heaven and earth exhibit no benevolence; to them the ten thousand things are like straw dogs. The holy man exhibits no benevolence; to him the hundred families are like straw dogs.

Is not the space between heaven and earth like unto a bellows? It is empty; yet it collapses not. It moves, and more and more comes forth. [But]

“How soon exhausted is
A gossip’s fulsome talk!
And should we not prefer
On the middle path to walk?”

6. THE COMPLETION OF FORM.

“The valley spirit not expires,
Mysterious mother ’tis called by the sires

The mysterious mother's door, to boot,
Is called of Heaven and earth the root.
Forever and aye it seems to endure
And its use is without effort sure."

7. DIMMING RADIANCE.

Heaven endures and earth is lasting. And why can heaven and earth endure and be lasting? Because they do not live for themselves. On that account can they endure.

Therefore the holy man puts his person behind and his person comes to the front. He surrenders his person and his person is preserved. Is it not because he seeks not his own? For that reason he can accomplish his own.

8. EASY BY NATURE.

Superior goodness resembleth water. Water in goodness benefiteth the ten thousand things, yet it quarreleth not. Because it dwells in places which the multitude of men shun, therefore it is near unto the eternal Reason.

For a dwelling goodness chooses the level. For a heart goodness chooses commotion. When giving, goodness chooses benevolence. In words, goodness chooses faith. In government goodness chooses order. In business goodness chooses ability. In its motion goodness chooses timeliness. It quarreleth not. Therefore, it is not rebuked.

9. PRACTISING PLACIDITY.

Holding and keeping full, had that not better be left alone? Handling and keeping sharp, can that wear long? If gold and jewels fill the hall no one can protect it.

Rich and high but proud, brings about its own misfortune. To accomplish merit and acquire fame, then to withdraw oneself, that is Heaven's Way.

10. WHAT CAN BE DONE.

He who sustains and disciplines his soul and embraces unity cannot be deranged. Through attention to his vitality and inducing tenderness he can become like a little child. By purifying, by cleansing and profound intuition he can be free from faults.

In loving the people and administering the country he can practise non-assertion. Opening and closing the gates of heaven he can be like a mother-bird: bright, and white, and penetrating the four quarters, he can be unsophisticated. He quickens them and feeds them. He quickens but owns not. He acts but claims not. He excels but rules not. This is called profound virtue.

11. THE FUNCTION OF THE NON-EXISTENT.

Thirty spokes unite in one nave and on that which is non-existent [on the hole in the nave] depends the wheel's utility. Clay is moulded into a vessel and on that which is non-existent [on its hollowness] depends the vessel's utility. By cutting out doors and windows we build a house and on that which is non-existent [on the empty space] depends the house's utility.

Therefore, when the existence of things is profitable, it is the non-existent in them which renders them useful.

12. ABSTAINING FROM DESIRE.

"The five colors the human eye will blind,
The five notes the human ear will rend.
The five tastes the human mouth offend."

"Racing and hunting will human hearts turn mad, Objects of prize make human conduct bad."

Therefore the holy man attends to the inner and not to the outer. He abandons the latter and chooses the former.

13. LOATHING SHAME.

"Favor and disgrace bode awe.
Esteeming the body bodes great trouble."

What is meant by "favor and disgrace bode awe?"
Favor humiliates. Its gain bodes awe; its loss bodes awe. This is meant by "favor and disgrace bode awe."

What is meant by "Esteeming the body bodes great trouble"?

I have trouble because I have a body. When I have no body, what trouble remains?

Therefore, if one administers the empire as he cares for his body, he can be entrusted with the empire.

14. PRAISING THE MYSTERIOUS.

We look at Reason and do not see it; its name is Colorless. We listen to Reason and do not hear it; its name is Soundless. We grope for Reason and do not grasp it; its name is Incorporeal.

These three things cannot further be analysed. Thus they are combined and conceived as a unity which on its surface is not clear but in its depth not obscure.

Forever and aye Reason remains unnamable, and again and again it returns home to non-existence. This is called the form of the formless, the image of the imageless. This is called transcendently abstruse.

In front its beginning is not seen. In the rear its end is not seen.

By holding fast to the Reason of the ancients, the present is mastered and the origin of the past understood. This is called Reason's clue.

15. THE REVEALERS OF VIRTUE.

Those of yore who have succeeded in becoming masters are subtle, spiritual, profound, and penetrating. On account of their profundity they cannot be understood. Because they cannot be understood, therefore I endeavor to make them intelligible.

How they are cautious! Like men in winter crossing a river. How reluctant! Like men fearing in the four quarters their neighbors. How reserved! They behave like guests. How elusive! They resemble ice when melting. How simple! They resemble unseasoned wood. How empty! They resemble the valley. How obscure! They resemble troubled waters.

Who by quieting can gradually render muddy waters clear? Who by stirring can gradually quicken the still?

He who keeps this Reason is not anxious to be filled. Since he is not filled, therefore he can grow old and need not be newly fashioned.

16. RETURNING TO THE ROOT.

Attain vacuity's completion and guard tranquility's fulness.

All the ten thousand things arise, and I see them return. Now they bloom in bloom, but each one homeward returneth to its root.

Returning to the root means rest. It signifies the return according to destiny. Return according to destiny means the eternal. Knowing the eternal means enlightenment. Not knowing the eternal causes passions to rise; and that is evil.

Knowing the eternal renders comprehensive. Comprehensive means broad. Broad means royal. Royal means heavenly. Heavenly means Reason. Reason means lasting. Thus the decay of the body implies no danger.

17. SIMPLICITY IN HABITS.

Where great sages are [in power], the subjects do not notice their existence. Where there are lesser sages, the people are attached to them; they praise them. Where still lesser ones are, the people fear them; and where still lesser ones are, the people despise them. For it is said:

“If your faith be insufficient, verily, you will receive no faith.”

How reluctantly sages consider their words! Merit they accomplish; deeds they perform; and the hundred families think: “We are independent; we are free.”

18. THE PALLIATION OF VULGARITY.

When the great Reason is obliterated, we have benevolence and justice. Prudence and circumspection appear, and we have much hypocrisy. When family relations no longer harmonise, we have filial piety and paternal love. When the country and the clans decay through disorder, we have loyalty and allegiance.

19. RETURNING TO SIMPLICITY.

Abandon your saintliness; put away your prudence; and the people will gain a hundred-fold!

Abandon your benevolence; put away your justice; and the people will return to filial devotion and paternal love!

Abandon your scheming; put away your gains; and thieves and robbers will no longer exist.

These are the three things for which we deem culture insufficient. Therefore it is said:

“Hold fast to that which will endure,
Show thyself simple, preserve thee pure,
Thy own keep small, thy desires poor.”

20. DIFFERENT FROM THE VULGAR.

Abandon learnedness, and you have no vexation. The “yes” compared with the “yea,” how little do they differ! But the good compared with the bad, how much do they differ!

What the people dread cannot be dreadless! How great is their desolation. Alas! it has not yet reached its limit.

The multitude of men are happy, so happy, as though celebrating a great feast. They are as though in springtime ascending a tower. I alone remain quiet, alas! like one that has not yet received an encouraging omen. I am like unto a babe that does not yet smile.

Forlorn am I, O, so forlorn! It appears that I have no place whither I may return home.

The multitude of men all have plenty and I alone appear empty. Alas! I am a man whose heart is foolish.

Ignorant am I, O, so ignorant! Common people are bright, so bright, I alone am dull.

Common people are smart, so smart, I alone am confused, so confused.

Desolate am I, alas! like the sea. Adrift, alas! like one who has no place where to stay.

The multitude of men all possess usefulness. I alone am awkward and a rustic too. I alone differ from others, but I prize seeking sustenance from our mother.

21. EMPTYING THE HEART.

"Vast virtue's form
Follows Reason's norm.
And Reason's nature
Is vague and eluding.
How eluding and vague
All types including.
How vague and eluding!
All beings including.
How deep, and how obscure.
It harbors the spirit pure,
Whose truth is ever sure,
Whose faith abides for aye
From of yore until to-day.
Its name is without cessation.
It watches the world's formation."

Whereby do I know that it watches the world's formation? By this same Reason!

22. HUMILITY'S INCREASE.

"The deficient will recuperate.
 And the crooked shall be straight.
 The empty find their fill.
 The worn with strength will thrill.
 Who have little shall receive.
 Who have much will have to grieve."

Therefore the holy man embraces unity and becomes for all the world a model. He is not self-displaying, and thus he shines. He is not self-approving, and thus he is distinguished. He is not self-praising, and thus he acquires merit. He is not self-glorifying and thus he excels. Since he does not quarrel, therefore no one in the world can quarrel with him.

The saying of the ancients: "The deficient will recuperate," is it in any way vainly spoken? Verily, they will recuperate and return home.

23. EMPTINESS AND NON-EXISTENCE.

To be taciturn is the natural way.

A hurricane does not outlast the morning. A cloud-burst does not outlast the day. Who causes these events but heaven and earth? If even heaven and earth cannot be unremitting, will not man be much less so?

Therefore one who pursues his business with Reason, the man of Reason, is identified with Reason. The man who pursues his business with virtue is identified tified with virtue. The man who pursues his business with loss is identified with loss. When identified with Reason, he forsooth joyfully embraces Reason; when identified with virtue, he forsooth joyfully embraces virtue; and when identified with loss, he forsooth joyfully embraces loss.

"He whose faith is insufficient shall not find faith."

24. TROUBLES IN [THE EAGERNESS TO ACQUIRE] MERIT.

A man on tiptoe cannot stand. A man astride cannot walk. A self-displaying man cannot shine. A self-approving man cannot be distinguished. A self-praising man cannot acquire merit. A self-glorying man cannot excel. Before the tribunal of Reason he is like offal of food and like an excrescence in the system which all people are likely to detest. Therefore, one who has Reason does not rely on him.

25. IMAGING THE MYSTERIOUS.

There is Being that is all-containing, which precedes the existence of heaven and earth. How calm it is! How incorporeal! Alone it stands and does not change. Everywhere it goes without running a risk, and can on that account become the world's mother. I know not its name. Its character is defined as Reason. When obliged to give it a name, I call it the Great. The Great I call the Evasive. The Evasive I call the Distant. The Distant I call the Returning.

The saying goes: "Reason is great, Heaven is great, Earth is great, and Royalty also is great. There are four things in the world that are great, and Royalty is one of them."

Man's standard is the Earth. The earth's standard is Heaven. Heaven's standard is Reason. Reason's standard is intrinsic.

26. THE VIRTUE OF DIGNITY.

The heavy is of the light the root, and rest is motion's master.

Therefore the holy man in his daily walk does not depart from dignity. Although he may have magnificent sights, he calmly sits with liberated mind.

But how is it with the master of the ten thousand chariots? In his personal conduct he makes light of the empire. He makes light of it and will lose his vassals. He is passionate and will lose the throne.

27. THE FUNCTION OF SKILL.

"Good travellers leave not trace nor track,
Good speakers, in logic show no lack,
Good counters need no counting rack.

"Good lockers bolting bars need not,
Yet none their locks can loose.
Good binders need not string nor knot,
Yet none unties their noose."

Therefore the holy man is always a good saviour of men, for there are no outcast people. He is always a good saviour of things, for there are no outcast things. This is called concealed enlightenment.

Therefore the good man is the bad man's instructor, while the bad man is the good man's capital. He who does not esteem his instructor, and he who does not love his capital, although he may be prudent, is greatly disconcerted. This I call significant spirituality.

28. RETURNING TO SIMPLICITY.

"Who his manhood shows
And his womanhood knows
Becomes the empire's river.
Is he the empire's river,
He will from virtue never deviate,
And home he turneth to a child's estate.

"Who his brightness shows
And his blackness knows
Becomes the empire's model.
Is he the empire's model,
Of virtue never he'll be destitute,
And home he turneth to the absolute.

"Who knows his fame
And guards his shame
Becomes the empire's valley.
Is he the empire's valley,
For e'er his virtue will sufficient be,
And home he turneth to simplicity."

By scattering about his simplicity he makes [of the people] vessels of usefulness. The holy man employs them as officers ; for a great administration does no harm.

29. NON-ASSERTION.

When one desires to take in hand the empire and make it, I see him not succeed. The empire is a divine vessel which cannot be made. One who makes it, mars it. One who takes it, loses it. And it is said of beings :

“Some are obsequious, others move boldly,
Some breathe warmly, others coldly,
Some are strong and others weak,
Some rise proudly, others sneak.”

Therefore the holy man abandons pleasure, he abandons extravagance, he abandons indulgence.

30. BE CHARY OF WAR.

He who with Reason assists the master of mankind will not with arms conquer the empire. His methods [are such as] invite requital.

Where armies are quartered briars and thorns grow. Great wars unfailingly are followed by famines. A good man acts resolutely and then stops. He ventures not to take by force. He is resolute but not boastful ; resolute but not haughty ; resolute but not arrogant ; resolute because he cannot avoid it ; resolute but not violent.

Things thrive and then grow old. This is called un-Reason. Un-Reason soon ceases.

31. QUELLING WAR.

Even beautiful arms are unblest among tools, and people had better shun them. Therefore he who has Reason does not rely on them.

The superior man when residing at home honors the left. When using arms, he honors the right. Arms are unblest among tools and not the superior man's tools. Only when it is unavoidable he uses them. Peace and quietude he holds high. He conquers but rejoices not. Rejoicing at a conquest means to enjoy the slaughter of men. He who enjoys the slaughter of men will most assuredly not obtain his will in the empire.

32. THE VIRTUE OF HOLINESS.

Reason, so long as it remains absolute, is unnameable. Although its simplicity seems insignificant, the whole world does not dare to suppress it. If princes and kings could keep it, the ten thousand things would of themselves pay homage. Heaven and earth would unite in dropping sweet dew, and the people with no one to command them would of themselves be righteous.

But as soon as Reason creates order, it becomes nameable. Whenever the nameable in its turn acquires existence, one learns to know when to stop. By knowing when to stop, one avoids danger.

To illustrate Reason's relation to the world we compare it to streamlets and creeks in their course towards great rivers and the ocean.

33. THE VIRTUE OF DISCRIMINATION.

One who knows others is clever, but one who knows himself is enlightened.

One who conquers others is powerful, but one who conquers himself is mighty.

One who knows sufficiency is rich.

One who pushes with vigor has will, one who loses not his place endures. One who may die but will not perish, has life everlasting.

34. TRUST IN ITS PERFECTION.

How all-pervading is the great Reason ! It can be on the left and it can be on the right. The ten thousand things depend upon it for their life, and it refuses them not. When its merit is accomplished it assumes not the name. Lovingly it nourishes the ten thousand things and plays not the lord. Ever desireless it can be classed with the small. The ten thousand things return home to it. It plays not the lord. It can be classed with the great.

Therefore, the holy man unto death does not make himself great and can thus accomplish his greatness.

35. THE VIRTUE OF BENEVOLENCE.

“Who holdeth fast to the great Form,
Of him the world will come in quest :

For there they never meet with harm,
But find contentment, comfort, rest."

Music with dainties makes the passing stranger stop. But Reason, when coming from the mouth, how tasteless is it! It has no flavor. When looked at, there is not enough to be seen; when listened to, there is not enough to be heard. However, its use is inexhaustible.

36. THE SECRET'S EXPLANATION.

That which is about to contract has surely been [first] expanded. That which is about to weaken has surely been [first] strengthened. That which is about to fall has surely been [first] raised. That which is about to be despoiled has surely been [first] endowed.

This is an explanation of the secret that the tender and the weak conquer the hard and the strong.

[Therefore beware of hardness and strength:] As the fish should not escape from the deep, so with the country's sharp tools the people should not become acquainted.

37. ADMINISTRATION OF GOVERNMENT.

Reason always practises non-assertion, and there is nothing that remains undone.

If princes and kings could keep Reason, the ten thousand things would of themselves be reformed. While being reformed they would yet be anxious to stir; but I would restrain them by the simplicity of the Ineffable.

“The simplicity of the unexpressed
Will purify the heart of lust.
Where there's no lust there will be rest,
And all the world will thus be blest.”

38. DISCOURSING ON VIRTUE.

Superior virtue is un-virtue. Therefore it has virtue. Inferior virtue never loses sight of virtue. Therefore it has no virtue. Superior virtue is non-assertion and without pretension. Inferior virtue asserts and makes pretensions.

Superior benevolence acts but makes no pretensions.

Superior justice acts and makes pretensions. The superior propriety acts and when no one responds to it, it stretches its arm and enforces its rules. Thus one loses Reason and then virtue appears. One loses virtue and then benevolence appears. One loses benevolence and then justice appears. One loses justice and then propriety appears. The rules of propriety are the semblance of loyalty and faith, and the beginning of disorder.

Quick-wittedness is the [mere] flower of Reason, but of ignorance the beginning.

Therefore a great organiser abides by the solid and dwells not in the external. He abides in the fruit and dwells not in the flower. Therefore he discards the latter and chooses the former.

39. THE ROOT OF ORDER.

From of old these things have obtained oneness:

"Heaven through oneness has become pure.

Earth through oneness can endure.

Minds through oneness their souls procure.

Valleys through oneness repletion secure.

"All creatures through oneness to life have been called.

And kings were through oneness as models installed."

Such is the result of oneness.

"Were heaven not pure it might be rent.

Were earth not stable it might be bent.

Were minds not ensouled they'd be impotent.

Were valleys not filled they'd soon be spent.

"When creatures are lifeless who can their death prevent?

Are kings not models, but on highness bent,

Their fall, forsooth, is imminent."

Thus, the noble come from the commoners as their root, and the high rest upon the lowly as their foundation. Therefore, princes and kings call themselves orphans, widowers, and nobodies. Is this not because they [representing the unity of the commoners] take lowliness as their root?

The several parts of a carriage are not a carriage.

Those who have become a unity are neither anxious to be praised with praise like a gem, nor disdained with disdain like a stone.

40. AVOIDING ACTIVITY.

“Homeward is Reason’s course, Weakness is Reason’s force.”

Heaven and earth and the ten thousand things come from existence, but existence comes from non-existence.

41. SAMENESS IN DIFFERENCE.

When a superior scholar hears of Reason he endeavors to practise it. When an average scholar hears of Reason he will sometimes keep it and sometimes lose it. When an inferior scholar hears of Reason he will greatly ridicule it. Were it not thus ridiculed, it would as Reason be insufficient. Therefore the poet says :

“The reason-enlightened seem dark and black,
The reason-advanced seem going back,
The reason-straight-levelled seem rugged and slack.

“The high in virtue resemble a vale,
The purely white in shame must quail,
The staunchest virtue seems to fail.

“The solidest virtue seems not alert,
The purest chastity seems pervert,
The greatest square will rightness desert.

"The largest vessel is not yet complete,
The loudest sound is not speech replete,
The greatest form has no shape concrete."

Reason so long as it remains hidden is unnameable. Yet Reason alone is good for imparting and completing.

42. REASON'S MODIFICATIONS.

Reason begets unity; unity begets duality; duality begets trinity; and trinity begets the ten thousand things. The ten thousand things are sustained by YIN [the negative principle]; they are encompassed by YANG [the positive principle], and the immaterial CH'1 [the breath of life] renders them harmonious.

That which the people find odious, to be an orphan, a widower, or a nobody, kings and princes select as their titles. Thus, on the one hand, loss implies gain, and on the other hand, gain implies loss.

What others have taught I teach also. The strong and aggressive do not die a natural death; but I shall expound the doctrine's foundation.

43. ITS UNIVERSAL APPLICATION.

The world's weakest overcomes the world's hardest. Non-existence enters into the impenetrable. Thereby I comprehend of non-assertion the advantage, and of silence the lesson. There are few in the world who obtain the advantage of non-assertion.

44. SETTING UP PRECEPTS.

"Name or person, which is more near?
 Person or fortune, which is more dear?
 Gain or loss, which is more sear?
 "Extreme dotage leadeth to squandering,
 Hoarded wealth inviteth plundering.
 "Who is content incurs no humiliation,
 Who knows when to stop risks no vitiation,
 Forever lasteth his duration."

45. GREATEST VIRTUE.

"The greatest perfection seems imperfect,
 But its work undecaying remaineth.
 The greatest fulness is emptiness checked,
 But its work 's not exhausted nor waneth."
 "The straightest line resembleth a curve;
 The greatest sage as apprentice will serve;
 Most eloquent speakers will stammer and swerve."
 Motion conquers cold. Quietude conquers heat
 Purity and clearness are the world's standard.

46. MODERATION OF DESIRE.

When the world possesses Reason, race horses are reserved for hauling dung. When the world is without Reason, war horses are bred in the common.
 No greater sin than yielding to desire. No greater misery than discontent. No greater calamity than acquisitiveness.

Therefore, he who knows contentment's contentment is always content.

47. VIEWING THE DISTANT.

"Without passing out of the gate
The world's course I prognosticate.
Without peeping through the window
The heavenly Reason I contemplate.
The further one goes,
The less one knows."

Therefore the holy man does not travel, and yet he has knowledge. He does not see the things, and yet he defines them. He does not labor, and yet he completes.

48. FORGETTING KNOWLEDGE.

He who seeks learnedness will daily increase. He who seeks Reason will daily diminish. He will diminish and continue to diminish until he arrives at non-assertion. With non-assertion there is nothing that he cannot achieve. When he takes the empire, it is always because he uses no diplomacy. He who uses diplomacy is not fit to take the empire.

49. TRUST IN VIRTUE.

The holy man possesses not a fixed heart. The hundred families' hearts he makes his heart.

The good I meet with goodness; the bad I also meet with goodness; for virtue is good [throughout].

The faithful I meet with faith; the faithless I also meet with faith; for virtue is faithful [throughout].

The holy man dwells in the world anxious, very anxious in his dealings with the world. He universalises his heart, and the hundred families fix upon him their ears and eyes. The holy man treats them all as children.

50. THE ESTIMATION OF LIFE.

Going forth is life; coming home is death.

Three in ten are pursuers of life; three in ten are pursuers of death; three in ten of the men that live pass into the realm of death.

Now, what is the reason? It is because they live life's intensity.

Indeed, I understand that one who takes good care of his life, when travelling on land will not fall in with the rhinoceros or the tiger. When coming among soldiers, he need not fear arms and weapons. The rhinoceros finds no place where to insert its horn. The tiger finds no place where to lay his claws. Weapons find no place where to thrust their blades. The reason is that he does not belong to the realm of death.

51. NURSING VIRTUE.

Reason quickens all creatures. Virtue feeds them. Reality shapes them. The forces complete them. Therefore among the ten thousand things there is none that does not esteem Reason and honor virtue.

Since the esteem of Reason and the honoring of virtue is by no one commanded, it is forever spontaneous. Therefore it is said that Reason quickens all creatures, while virtue feeds them, raises them, nurtures them, completes them, matures them, rears them, and protects them.

To quicken but not to own, to make but not to claim, to raise but not to rule, this is called profound virtue.

52. RETURNING TO THE ORIGIN.

When the world takes its beginning, Reason becomes the world's mother.

When he who knows his mother, knows in turn that he is her child, and when he who is quickened as a child, in turn keeps to his mother, to the end of life, he is not in danger. When he closes his mouth, and shuts his sense-gates, in the end of life, he will encounter no trouble; but when he opens his mouth and meddles with affairs, in the end of life he cannot be saved.

Who beholds his smallness is called enlightened. Who preserves his tenderness is called strong. Who uses Reason's light and returns home to its enlightenment does not surrender his person to perdition. This is called practising the eternal.

53. GAINING INSIGHT.

If I have ever so little knowledge, I shall walk in the great Reason. It is but assertion that I must fear.

The great Reason is very plain, but people are fond of by-paths.

When the palace is very splendid, the fields are very weedy and granaries very empty.

To wear ornaments and gay clothes, to carry sharp swords, to be excessive in drinking and eating, to have a redundance of costly articles, this is the pride of robbers. Surely, this is un-Reason!

54. THE CULTIVATION OF INTUITION.

“What is well planted is not uprooted;

What's well preserved cannot be looted!”

By sons and grandsons the sacrificial celebrations shall not cease.

Who cultivates Reason in his person, his virtue is genuine. Who cultivates it in his house, his virtue is overflowing. Who cultivates it in his township, his virtue is lasting. Who cultivates it in his country, his virtue is abundant. Who cultivates it in the world, his virtue is universal.

Therefore, by one's person one tests persons. By one's house one tests houses. By one's township one tests townships. By one's country one tests countries. By one's world one tests worlds.

How do I know that the world is such? Through Reason.

55. THE SIGNET OF THE MYSTERIOUS.

He who possesses virtue in all its solidity is like unto a little child. Venomous reptiles do not sting him, fierce beasts do not seize him. Birds of prey do not strike him. His bones are weak, his sinews tender, but his grasp is firm. He does not yet know the relation between male and female, but his virility is strong. Thus his metal grows to perfection. A whole day he might cry and sob without growing hoarse. This shows the perfection of his harmony.

To know the harmonious is called the eternal. To know the eternal is called enlightenment.

To increase life is called a blessing, and heart-directed vitality is called strength, but things vigorous are about to grow old and I call this un-Reason. Un-Reason soon ceases !

56. THE VIRTUE OF THE MYSTERIOUS.

One who knows does not talk. One who talks does not know. Therefore the sage keeps his mouth shut and his sense-gates closed.

“He will blunt his own sharpness,
His own tangles adjust ;
He will dim his own radiance,
And be one with his dust.”

This is called profound identification.

Thus he is inaccessible to love and also inaccessible to enmity. He is inaccessible to profit and inaccessible to loss. He is also inaccessible to favor and inaccessible to disgrace. Thus he becomes world-honored.

57. SIMPLICITY IN HABITS.

With rectitude one governs the state ; with craftiness one leads the army ; with non-diplomacy one takes the empire. How do I know that it is so ? Through Reason.

The more restrictions and prohibitions are in the empire, the poorer grow the people. The more weapons the people have, the more troubled is the state. The more there is cunning and skill, the more startling events will happen. The more mandates and laws are enacted, the more there will be thieves and robbers.

Therefore the holy man says : I practise non-assertion, and the people of themselves reform. I love quietude, and the people of themselves become righteous. I use no diplomacy, and the people of themselves become rich. I have no desire, and the people of themselves remain simple.

58. ADAPTATION TO CHANGE.

Whose government is unostentatious, quite unostentatious, his people will be prosperous, quite prosperous. Whose government is prying, quite prying, his people will be needy, quite needy.

Misery, alas ! rests upon happiness. Happiness, alas ! underlies misery. But who foresees the catastrophe ? It will not be prevented !

What is ordinary becomes again extraordinary.

What is good becomes again unpropitious. This bewilders people, which happens constantly since times immemorial.

Therefore the holy man is square but not sharp, strict but not obnoxious, upright but not restraining, bright but not dazzling.

59. HOLD FAST TO REASON.

In governing the people and in attending to heaven there is nothing like moderation. As to moderation, it is said that it must be an early habit. If it is an early habit, it will be richly accumulated virtue. If one has richly accumulated virtue, then there is nothing that cannot be overcome. If there is nothing that cannot be overcome, then no one knows his limits. If no one knows his limits, one can possess the country. If one possesses the mother of the country [viz., moderation], one can thereby last long. This is called having deep roots and a firm stem. To long life and lasting comprehension this is the Way.

60. HOW TO MAINTAIN ONE'S PLACE.

Govern a great country as you would fry small fish: [neither gut nor scale them].

If with Reason the empire is managed, its ghosts will not spook. Not only will its ghosts not spook, but its gods will not harm the people. Not only will its gods not harm the people, but its holy men will also not harm the people. Since neither will do harm, therefore their virtues will be combined.

61. THE VIRTUE OF HUMILITY.

A great state, one that lowly flows, becomes the empire's union, and the empire's wife. The wife always through quietude conquers her husband, and by quietude renders herself lowly. Thus a great state through lowliness toward small states will conquer the small states, and small states through lowliness toward great states will conquer great states.

Therefore some render themselves lowly for the purpose of conquering ; others are lowly and therefore conquer.

A great state desires no more than to unite and feed the people ; a small state desires no more than to devote itself to the service of the people ; but that both may obtain their wishes, the greater one must stoop.

62. PRACTISE REASON.

It is Reason that is the ten thousand things' asylum, the good man's wealth, the bad man's stay.

With beautiful words one can sell. With honest conduct one can do still more with the people.

If a man be bad, why should he be thrown away? Therefore, an emperor was elected and three ministers appointed ; but better than holding before one's face the jade table [of the ministry] and riding with four horses, is sitting still and propounding the eternal Reason.

Why do the ancients prize this Reason ? Is it not, say, because when sought it is obtained and the sinner thereby can be saved? Therefore it is world-honored.

63. CONSIDER BEGINNINGS.

Assert non-assertion. Practise non-practice. Taste non-taste. Make great the small. Make much the little.

Requite hatred with goodness.

Contemplate a difficulty when it is easy. Manage a great thing when it is small.

The world's most difficult undertakings necessarily originate while easy, and the world's greatest undertakings necessarily originate while small.

Therefore the holy man to the end does not venture to play the great, and thus he can accomplish his greatness. As one who lightly promises rarely keeps his word, so he to whom many things are easy will necessarily encounter many difficulties. Therefore, the holy man regards everything as difficult, and thus to the end encounters no difficulties.

64. MIND THE INSIGNIFICANT.

What is still at rest is easily kept quiet. What has not as yet appeared is easily prevented. What is still feeble is easily broken. What is still scant is easily dispersed.

Treat things before they exist. Regulate things before disorder begins. The stout tree has originated from a tiny rootlet. A tower of nine stories is raised by heaping up [bricks of] clay. A thousand miles' journey begins with a foot.

He that makes mars. He that grasps loses.

The holy man does not make ; therefore he mars not. He does not grasp ; therefore he loses not. The people when undertaking an enterprise are always near completion, and yet they fail. Remain careful to the end as in the beginning and you will not fail in your enterprise.

Therefore the holy man desires to be desireless, and does not prize articles difficult to obtain. He learns, not to be learned, and seeks a home where multitudes of the people pass by. He assists the ten thousand things in their natural development, but he does not venture to interfere.

65. THE VIRTUE OF SIMPLICITY.

The ancients who were well versed in Reason did not thereby enlighten the people ; they intended thereby to make them simple-hearted.

If people are difficult to govern, it is because they are too smart. To govern the country with smartness is the country's curse. To govern the country without smartness is the country's blessing. He who knows these two things is also a model [like the ancients]. Always to know them is called profound virtue.

Profound virtue, verily, is deep. Verily, it is far-reaching. Verily, it is to everything reverse. But then it will procure great recognition.

66. PUTTING ONESELF BEHIND.

That rivers and oceans can of the hundred valleys be kings is due to their excelling in lowliness. Thus they can of the hundred valleys be the kings.

Therefore the holy man, when anxious to be above the people, must in his words keep underneath them. When anxious to lead the people, he must with his person keep behind them.

Therefore the holy man dwells above, but the people are not burdened. He is ahead, but the people suffer no harm. Therefore the world rejoices in exalting him without tiring. Because he strives not, no one in the world will strive with him.

67. THE THREE TREASURES.

All in the world call me great ; but I resemble the unlikely. Now a man is great only because he resembles the unlikely. Did he resemble the likely, how lasting, indeed, would his mediocrity be !

I have three treasures which I preserve and treasure. The first is called compassion. The second is called economy. The third is called not daring to come in the world to the front. The compassionate can be brave ; the economical can be generous ; those who dare not come to the front in the world can become perfect as chief vessels.

Now, if people discard compassion and are brave ;

if they discard economy and are generous ; if they discard modesty and are ambitious, they will surely die

Now, the compassionate will in the attack be victorious, and in the defence firm. Heaven when about to save one will with compassion protect him.

68. COMPLYING WITH HEAVEN.

He who excels as a warrior is not warlike. He who excels as a fighter is not wrathful. He who excels in conquering the enemy does not strive. He who excels in employing men is lowly.

This is called the virtue of not-striving. This is called utilising men's ability. This is called complying with heaven—since olden times the highest.

69. THE FUNCTION OF THE MYSTERIOUS.

A military expert used to say: "I dare not act as host [who takes the initiative] but act as guest [with reserve]. I dare not advance an inch, but I withdraw a foot."

This is called marching without marching, threatening without arms, charging without hostility, seizing without weapons.

No greater misfortune than making light of the enemy! When we make light of the enemy, it is almost as though we had lost our treasure—[compassion].

Thus, if matched armies encounter one another, the tenderer one is sure to conquer.

70. DIFFICULT TO UNDERSTAND.

My words are very easy to understand and very easy to practise, but in the world no one can understand, no one can practise them.

Words have an ancestor; Deeds have a master [viz., Reason]. Since he is not understood, therefore I am not understood. Those who understand me are few, and thus I am distinguished.

Therefore the holy man wears wool, and hides in his bosom his jewels.

71. THE DISEASE OF KNOWLEDGE.

To know the unknowable that is elevating. Not to know the knowable that is sickness.

Only by becoming sick of sickness we can be without sickness.

The holy man is not sick. Because he is sick of sickness, therefore he is not sick.

72. HOLDING ONESELF DEAR.

If the people do not fear the dreadful, the great dreadful will come, surely.

Do not render their lives narrow. Do not make their lot wearisome. When it is not made wearisome, then it will not be wearisome.

Therefore, the holy man knows himself but does not display himself. He holds himself dear but does not honor himself. Thus he discards the latter and chooses the former.

73. DARING TO ACT.

Courage, if carried to daring, leads to death; courage, if not carried to daring, leads to life. Either of these two things is sometimes beneficial, sometimes harmful.

“Why 't is by heaven rejected,
Who has the reason detected?”

Therefore the holy man also regards it as difficult.

The Heavenly Reason strives not, but it is sure to conquer. It speaks not, but it is sure to respond. It summons not, but it comes of itself. It works patiently but is sure in its designs.

Heaven's net is vast, so vast. It is wide-meshed, but it loses nothing.

74. OVERCOME DELUSION.

If the people do not fear death, how can they be frightened by death?

If we make people fear death, and supposing some would [still] venture to rebel, if we seize them for capital punishment, who will dare?

There is always an executioner who kills. Now to take the place of the executioner who kills is taking the place of the great carpenter who hews. If a man takes the place of the great carpenter who hews, he will rarely, indeed, fail to injure his hand.

75. HARMED THROUGH GREED.

The people hunger because their superiors consume too many taxes ; therefore they hunger. The people are difficult to govern because their superiors are too meddlesome ; therefore it is difficult to govern. The people make light of death on account of the intensity of their clinging to life ; therefore they make light of death.

He who is not bent on life is worthier than he who esteems life.

76. BEWARE OF STRENGTH.

Man during life is tender and delicate. When he dies he is stiff and stark.

The ten thousand things, the grass as well as the trees, are while they live tender and supple. When they die they are rigid and dry. Thus the hard and the strong are the companions of death. The tender and the delicate are the companions of life.

Therefore, he who in arms is strong will not conquer. When a tree has grown strong it is doomed.

The strong and the great stay below. The tender and the delicate stay above.

77. HEAVEN'S REASON.

Is not Heaven's Reason truly like stretching a bow? The high it brings down, the lowly it lifts up. Those who have abundance it depleteth ; those who are deficient it augmenteth.

Such is Heaven's Reason. It depleteth those who have abundance but completeth the deficient.

Man's Reason is not so. He depletes the deficient in order to serve those who have abundance. Where is he who would have abundance for serving the world? It is the man of Reason.

Therefore the holy man acts but claims not ; merit he accomplishes but he does not linger upon it, and does he ever show any anxiety to display his excellence?

78. TRUST IN FAITH.

In the world nothing is tenderer and more delicate than water. In attacking the hard and the strong nothing will surpass it. There is nothing that herein takes its place. The weak conquer the strong, the tender conquer the rigid. In the world there is no one who does not know it, but no one will practise it. Therefore the holy man says :

“Him who the country's sin makes his,
We hail as priest at the great sacrifice.
Him who the curse bears of the country's failing
As king of the empire we are hailing.”

True words seem paradoxical.

79. KEEP YOUR OBLIGATIONS.

When a great hatred is reconciled, naturally some hatred will remain. How can this be made good?

Therefore the sage keeps the obligations of his contract and exacts not from others. Those who have virtue attend to their obligations; those who have no virtue attend to their claims.

Heaven's Reason shows no preference but always assists the good man.

80. REMAINING IN ISOLATION.

In a small country with few people let there be aldermen and mayors who are possessed of power over men but would not use it. Induce people to grieve at death but do not cause them to move to a distance. Although they had ships and carriages, they should find no occasion to ride in them. Although they had armours and weapons, they should find no occasion to don them.

Induce people to return to [the old custom of] knotted cords and to use them [in the place of writing], to delight in their food, to be proud of their clothes, to be content with their homes, and to rejoice in their customs: then in a neighboring state within sight, the voices of the cocks and dogs would be within hearing, yet the people might grow old and die before they visited one another.

81. PROPOUNDING THE ESSENTIAL.

True words are not pleasant; pleasant words are not true. The good are not contentious; the contentious are not good. The wise are not learned; the learned are not wise.

The holy man hoards not. The more he does for others, the more he owns himself. The more he gives to others, the more he acquires himself.

Heaven's Reason is to benefit but not to injure; the holy man's Reason is to act but not to strive.

NOTES AND COMMENTS

NOTES AND COMMENTS.

[The numbers attached to the transcriptions of the Chinese characters commented upon in these notes, indicate their respective places in the passages and chapters under which they are mentioned. References to Sze Ma-Ch'ien's Historical Introduction are made by using the abbreviation S. M. Ch.; references to words in the Tao-Teh-King are simply given by figures denoting the chapter, the section, and the number of the word.]

HISTORICAL INTRODUCTION BY SZE-MA-CH' IEN.

Sze means "trustee," ma "horse," and ch'ien "to move to distance."

The word chw'en, which means as a noun "report" or "tradition," as a verb "to transmit," might in this connexion be better translated "biography."

I.

While we should begin in an enumeration such as this with the smaller and rise to the larger, the Chinese mention first the larger and proceed to the smaller. We should say: Lao-Tze was born in the village of Goodman's Bend, Grinding County, Thistle Province, Bramble State. For further details see pages 3-6 in the first chapter of the Introduction.

The characters ché (3) and jan (12) "one" and "man" belong together, but in a translation the former has naturally to be dropped. The word jan, man, is used in the sense of the English endings er (in such words as Londoner) and ian (in Washingtonian).

The word yé (13) means "indeed." It is an affirmation which is here used as a final particle, indicating the conclusion of the sentence.

II.

The word shi (3) sometimes translatable by "esquire," without being exactly an aristocratic title, is a term of distinction; it is added to family names of prominence.

It would be impolite in Chinese society to address men of distinction by their names, which is a privilege reserved to their most intimate friends only. Appellations are given to young men when they become of age or at the ceremony of graduation. Lao-Tze's appellation Poh Yang (7-8), Prince Positive, is apparently a distinction which was given him in his youth by his teachers. Yang is the positive principle, representing the sun, south, and manliness. (See Note to Chapter 42, i. 20).

In addition to appellations, Chinese people receive a title after their death. This posthumous name is intended to characterise the man's life-work. Lao-Tze's posthumous title Tan does not mean "long-eared" but "long-lobed," and as long lobes are regarded as a symptom of virtue, it means "a master," or "a teacher," in the sense in which the term applies to a Buddha or a Christ. In all statues of Buddha, the ears have exceedingly long lobes, which according to Asiatic taste is not only a sign of virtue but also a mark of beauty.

The word chi (16) is very common in Chinese. It indicates that the following words stand in some relation to prior words. It may sometimes be translated by "his, her, its, or theirs," sometimes by placing the preceding noun into the genitive; and sometimes it serves as a pronoun of some preceding substantive, in which case it is translated by "him, her, it, or them." When connecting dependent sentences it may be translated by "that; as; when," etc., without, however, being otherwise an equivalent term of these words.

III.

The term yü (8), "with," serves to indicate the indirect object.

IV.

The relative su (5) and the pronoun ché (7), the ones, belong together.

The word i (13) means "to finish," "to pass," and is employed to indicate the perfect tense. It must be distinguished from chi, self, which presents the same appearance. Compare Williams, S. D., p. 278 (i) with, p. 337, (chi).

V.

Kiün (2) tsz' (3), "the superior sage," or "the royal philosopher," is a common term in Chinese. It means "the ideal man," and is a synonym of shang jan, "the holy man, the saint, the sage." See Introduction pp. 27-29.

The word shi (6) means "the right time" or "the right season."

The word kia (8) means literally "mounting a carriage."

P'ung (14) is, according to the commentators, a plant growing in the sand and easily carried about in the winds.

The word lei (15) means "to heap," "to gather," "to bind." But the commentators declare that it acquires in this connexion the sense of drifting or being carried about.

VI.

Williams (S. D., p. 1146) defines the word yung (14) "to receive," or, as a noun, "face; mien; screen."

VII.

The word k'ü (1) "depart" is here causative: "let depart."

The words tsz' (2) chi (3), "the sir's," stand here in the second person, meaning "sir, your," etc.

The word k'i (5) means "the vital principle, air, breath, spirit, mettle." See the translator's article on "Chinese Philosophy" in The Monist, Vol. VI., No. 2, pp. 211-214.

The word seh (9), color, is used in the sense of showy or stage-like behavior, bland manners, and externalities which are for the eye only.

The position of this sentence cannot be retained in English. It means: "That is what (22) I (21) communicate (24) to (23), the sir (25), [in a way] like (26) this (27), and (28) that is all (29)."

VIII.

 Confucius felt much elated at his endeavor to set the world an example of decorous demeanor. He probably expected praise for realising the ideal of propriety, not censure, and was, therefore, greatly dismayed when Lao-Tze denounced his highest aspirations as "proud airs" and "affectations." The basis of Confucian ethics is "filial piety" which inculcates reverence for parents, superiors, and ancestors. Confucius represents belief in tradition. The wisdom of the sages of yore is to him a divine revelation which if questioned would leave the world without any standard of right. Lao-Tze recognises no personal authority whatever, and bases his ethics upon the eternal norm of the Tao, upon abstract reason, the immutable principles of right, of truth, and goodness. Confucius, unable to grasp Lao-Tze's philosophy, is quite shocked at his condemnation of reverence. The personalities of the sages of yore are to Lao-Tze a matter of the past, their bones moulder in the dust; he considers their words alone as that which still remains of their existence, the value of which he measures by their agreement with the Tao.

Tsz' (5) means "child, boy, philosopher, sage." Ti (4) tsz' (5), younger followers, means "disciples."

Sheu (20) means any hairy quadruped that is wild; brutes, especially game. (Williams, S. D., p. 756.)

IX.

The word k'ò (3) means, as a noun, "power," or "ability;" as a verb, "to be able to be," implying a passive condition. If followed by ì (4) as here, both words together acquire an active meaning and are commonly translated by "can" or "could." The word ì, if used as a verb, means "to use, to aid, to serve, to concern oneself with." As a preposition it means "by," "through," "with." (See Williams, S. D., p. 278). Compare the note to Chapter 1, i., 2.

X.

The verb ch'ì (1) means "to go to," "to reach" (see xii, 12), when used as a preposition and in connexion with yü (2) it may be translated by "as to," "concerning," "with reference to."

The word 'r'h (12) is, as a rule, to be translated by "and" or "but." In this connexion it changes the next following shàng, high, into an adverb, viz., "up to" or "upwards."

The word yé (24) indicates that the sentence which terminates with it is a question.

XI.

The word siu (3) means "to cultivate," "to study," "to practise." (See Williams, S. D., p. 811.)

XII.

Here ch'ì (4) (the same as ii., 15 et alias) is added to the end of the sentence. It refers to k'iu, "long time," and we transliterate it by "then."

The word k'wan (13) means custom-house, toll-gate, boundary, frontier, pass, frontier-pass. (See Williams, S. D., p. 472.)

XIII.

The word yin (3) means "to grasp the hand," "to govern." As a noun, "chief or overseer." (Williams, S. D., p. 1102.) H? (4) means "to rejoice." Thus the whole name Yin-Hi signifies "he who rejoices being a chief."

K'iang (10) means "to force," "to compel." Here it should be translated "to request earnestly." (See Williams, S. D., p. 366.)

As a verb wéi (11) means "to act," "to do." As a preposition, "for the benefit of," "with regard to," "for the sake of." (See Gabelentz, Anfgr., p. 52, § 97, V.)

XIV.

The words yü (1) shí (2), "to this," mean in their combination "thereupon." (See Gabelentz, Anfgr., p. 55, § 103.)

Shang hia p'ien (8-10) means literally "of a higher and lower," i. e., a former and latter, division (installment). We should say, consisting of two parts.

THE OLD PHILOSOPHER'S CANON ON REASON AND VIRTUE.

King is the title of a book which has been canonised as a standard authority on the subject; it is sometimes translated classical book, or briefly classic, sometimes canon. See the quotation from Legge on page 38.

The ordinal in Chinese is expressed by the noun tí which corresponds to the English ending th, only that it precedes the number to which it is attached.

The term chang means "section" or "chapter."

CHAPTER I.

T'í, in the heading, is a compound of bone and sacrificial vessel. The word means, as a noun, "body;" as a verb, "to embody," "to realise," "to render solid," "to incarnate." (See Williams, S. D., p. 884.)

The word K'o (2), as a noun, "power," as a verb, "to be able," is always followed by a passive form, while K'o i (see note to S. M. Ch. ix. 3-4) is followed by an active form; accordingly, k'o tao means "it can be reasoned," and k'o i tao would mean "it can reason."

 The sentence i. 1-3 may be translated in various ways. Our version, "The Reason that can be reasoned," is the simplest translation that can be offered, but we might as well translate "the word that can be spoken," or, "the logic that can be argued," or, "the path that can be trodden." To avoid all these difficulties, Chalmers translates "the tau (or tao) that can be taued." The word tao comes nearest, as explained in the Introduction (pp. 9-10) to the Greek term logos, as used in the Fourth Gospel of the New Testament.

The word fei (4), "not," differs from pu, "not," by being more emphatic. Pu is the simple negation, in compounds answering the English un- or in-, as, e. g., pu teh, "unvirtue" (see Chapter 38); pu shan, "ungoodness" or "evil" (Chapter 2, ii.), pu chi (Chapter 3, vi., 6-7) "ungoverned" or "anarchical," etc. But fei means "by no means," implying a disavowal and an earnest rejection. Wu is still another kind of negation which also frequently occurs in compounds, such as wu ming, wu yü, etc. (See Williams, S. D., pp. 136, 717, and 1059.)

II.

The words wu ming (1-2) mean "nameless." Wu (see Williams, S. D., p. 1059) means "destitute of," "not having," answering in compounds to the English ending -less.

 The nameless, or unnameable, wu ming (1-2) is not only the undetermined, the abstract, but also the holy, the ineffable. The nameable, yü ming (7-8), is that which can be determined. It is the specific or concrete. For yü see Williams, S. D., p. 1113.

The term wan wuh (9-10), the myriad beings, things or creatures (see Williams, S. D., pp. 1040, 1065) means nature in its concrete existence as the sum total of all that exists. (See the first note to Chapter 2.)

The character chi (11) is the sign of the genitive. Always follows its noun. (See S. M. Ch. ii. 16.)

The sentence 7-12 means the immanent Tao, as the nameable, which is the factor that shapes the world of concrete realities.

III.

The word ku (1), "cause," "reason" (Williams, S. D., p. 434) is commonly used by Lao-Tze to introduce a quotation. It is tantamount to "therefore it has been said," or, "thus you have heard."

The words wu yü (3-4), "desireless," and yü yü (10-12) "having desire," or, "desirous," form a similar contrast as wu ming and yü ming.

The word miao (8) denotes "mysterious" or "spiritual," "mystery" or "spirituality."

IV.

The word ché (3), which is the same as S. M. Ch. i., 3, and ix., 2, etc., makes a noun of preceding adjectives or verbs, like the English word "one," or, "such a one," or, "he who." The two things meant are, presumably, the nameless and the nameable.

CHAPTER 2.

I.

The term t'ien hia (1-2), under the Heaven, denotes the world in about the same sense as in English. It means the cosmos and also the people, i. e., mankind at large, and especially the Chinese Empire. The terms wan wuh (Chapter 1, ii, 9-10), "the ten thousand things," and wéi wu, "the activity of the beings" are synonyms. The former may also be translated by "the whole world"; it is nature as the sum total of concrete existence. The latter is the inherent nature or character of things. Another term for "nature" or "universe" which, however, does not occur in the Tao-Teh-King, is yü ch'eu, signifying the whole cosmos in space as well as time. Yü means "the canopy of heaven," and ch'eu "from the beginning till now." See W. S. D., pp. 1126 and 49; compare Le livre des mille mots (Thsien-tseu-wen) by St. Julien, note to words 5 and 6.

The word i (11), "that is all," is a final particle indicating the end of a sentence, sometimes translated by "enough," and sometimes omitted. (See Williams, S. D., p. 278.)

II.

That Lao-Tze identifies the origin of evil with the conscious distinction between or the knowledge of good and evil, reminds us of the ideas that underlie the Biblical account of the fall of man. Adam's state before the fall is supposed to be a condition in which he does not know the difference between good and evil.

III.

Existence, yü (2), translates in Buddhist Scriptures the Sanskrit term bhava. (See Williams, S. D., p. 1113.) The present passage reminds us of Hamlet's phrase, "to be or not to be."

Shǎng (5), "to produce," is here, as indicated by siang, "mutually," either passive or must be taken as a reflexive verb. The verb shǎng (such is the pronunciation according to Williams, S. D., p. 742) was probably pronounced by Lao-Tze shing, for it rhymes with ching, "to perfect, to form," hing, "to shape," and k'ing, to incline. The words hwo or ho (21) and sui (25) must also have rhymed in their ancient pronunciation.

IV.

Shi i, (1-2) "this for," is used exactly as our English word "therefore." Subsequently it will be thus translated.

Wu wéi (6-7) is the favorite term of Lao-Tze and contains in one word the fundamental principle of his ethics. (See Williams, S. D., pp. 1059, 1047.)

V.

The particle yen (4), "there!" "well!" "why?" is descriptive and characterises the action as enduring or continuously taking place. As a final particle, "truly," "indeed," as an initial particle, "how?" "who is it?" "why?" (See Gabelentz, Anfgr., p. 58, § 109; and Williams, S. D., pp. 1082-1083.)

VI.

Shǎng (1), Williams, S. D., p. 742, "to grow," "to beget," "to quicken," "to live."

Chū (13), "he dwells in his merit." The term is frequently translated by "attaching oneself to."

VII.

Fu (1), "now," "forasmuch as." (Williams, S. D., p. 142.)

Wéi (2) must frequently remain untranslated; sometimes, as for instance in the sentence quoted on p. 14 from the Shu King, it takes the place of the auxiliary verb, "is" or "are." (Williams, S. D. p., 1049.)

CHAPTER 3.

III.

Stanislas Julien reads between sin (6), "heart," and pu (7), "not," the word min, "people," a repetition of the preceding min, 3, i. 5 and 3, ii. 8.

Three advices given to rulers, stating what they should not do; pu shang (3, i. 1-2), "not to exalt;" pu kwéi (3, ii. 1-2), "not prize;" and pu chien (3, iii. 1-2), "not to look at."

IV.

Sin (9), heart, is "the seat of desire," while fu (12) (see Williams, S. D., p. 151) which means literally "stomach," is conceived to be "the seat of the mind." As an adjective it means "dear," "intimate," and the most probable interpretation is that the word fu is here intended to mean the seat of mental capacities and sensible sentiment, as opposed to sin, the seat of desires or passions.

A similar contrast is intended between chi (15) and kuh (18). The former means "will," "wish," "desire"; the latter, "bone." The former characterises self-willed or head-strong people; the latter, sturdiness, strength, character, or, in a word, backbone.

V.

Chì (5), "to know," is here used in an evil sense; viz., "to be cunning," or "to be crafty." Wu chi (4-5) means "not cunning," "unsophisticated;" and chì ché (10-11), "the crafty."

Yé (15), "indeed," the particle of affirmation, renders the sentence emphatic.

VI.

The phrase wei wu wéi (1-3), "to act with non-assertion," is an irrefutable evidence that wu wéi cannot mean "inactivity."

CHAPTER 4.

I.

The characters pu ying (7-8) belong together, meaning "never exhausted," or briefly "inexhaustible." For pu in the sense of the English in- or un-, see note to Chapter 1, i. 4.

Whether we take tao (1) or yung (4) as the subject of pu ying (7-8) is indifferent. The sense is in either case the same.

Hu (10), "oh!" "well!" "indeed?" is a particle of exclamation.

The word Tsung (15), "ancestor," "patriarch," (St. Julien, "premier aïeul"; Strauss, "Urvater"; "Ahnherr") must be regarded as a synonym of Ti, "the Lord or God."

II.

This passage, which is repeated in Chapter 56, is a poetical quotation. The words fǎn (6), "fetter," and ch'ǎn (12), "dust," are rhymes.

☞ The words of this passage, t'ung ch'i ch'än (10-12), "it becomes one with its dust," are, in the translator's opinion, clear, but it is difficult to give an exact translation. It means that the Tao's sameness, its own identity, is preserved even in the smallest and most contemptible of things, viz., in the motes of the dust. The purely formal laws of logic, mathematics and pure mechanics are the same for stars and for molecules.

III.

☞ Two of my Japanese editions read hwo, which means "apparently, probably" (Williams, S. D., p. 224), while the two others read joh, which means "likely" (ib., p. 296). St. Julien, adopting the isolated reading of his edition G, prefers to read chang (eternally), which, however, seems to be the emendation of an ancient copyist. The reading hwo gives no sense, and may have slipped in as being to a certain degree a synonym of joh. In adopting the reading joh (4), we interpret the passage to mean: "it seems in its likeness to remain," that is to say, "it appears to be immutable."

☞ The term Ti (13) or frequently Shang Ti, meaning "Lord" or "the highest Lord," is commonly used in Chinese in the same sense as the English term Lord in the Bible. It means God and implies always the personality of God. The context, however, justifies neither the conclusion that Lao-Tze regarded the Tao as a personal Deity, nor that he thought of the Tao and God as two distinct entities. He may and probably did introduce the word ti (God), as commonly used and understood by the people, neither affirming nor denying his existence, simply stating that Tao, or Reason, or the Logos (viz., the prototype of human reason, those inalienable conditions of all the relations of any possible reality, which logicians and mathematicians formulate in rules that are possessed of an intrinsic necessity and universality) is truly and unequivocally eternal; it is absolutely eternal, while the Lord, supposing him to be a personal being, can only be regarded as relatively eternal. The Tao is prior even to God.

CHAPTER 5.

I.

☞ There has been much discussion about the meaning of grass-dogs. The common explanation suggested by the context of this passage is that grass-dogs or straw-dogs were used for sacrificial purposes, and probably offered as a burnt offering instead of living victims. Such is the traditional interpretation of all the commentators. Plaenckner's interpretation that grass-dogs were revered as a religious symbol (and not sacrificed or burned) is improbable.

II.

 This passage is difficult. The commentators explain jän (4) "humane or benevolent," as "having particular affection." Accordingly the sentence would mean, that the sage is not sentimental; he has as little preferences as heaven and earth, where the sun shines on the good as well as the evil, and where both, the good and the evil, are finally doomed to die as grass-dogs are sacrificed. The holy man understands that according to the course of nature man is doomed to die and his life is like a sacrifice. Harlez deviates from the traditional interpretation of the passage by translating: "Si le ciel et la terre étaient sans bonté, ils regarderaient tous les hommes comme des chiens de paille etc." This avoids the difficulty of saying that the sage is not humane; but what sense would the whole chapter have? And is not the idea that heaven shows no partiality a favorite idea of Lao-Tze, who repeats it in another sentence of chapter 79, the construction of which is not subject to the slightest doubt, where he says T'ien tao wu ts'in, "heaven's Tao shows no nepotism."

III.

Plaenckner allows his imagination too much play in translating t'ien ti chi chien, the space between heaven and earth, by Weltmenschen or worldlings.

To (7) means a bag, open at both ends, a purse (Williams, S. D., p. 915), and yoh (8), a flute or fife (ib., p. 1117). Both words combined are (as Williams states on p. 915) a bellows, or a tube through which potters blow into the fire, and not, as Plaenckner translates, a "bag-pipe."

IV.

This passage is a quotation, and appears to be a proverb. "The man of many words is frequently at his wit's end and will scarcely stick to the truth," for that is here the meaning of the middle path. (See the Introduction pages 31-32.)

Chung (16) means the middle; here it means the golden middle, i. e., the path of virtue and truth.

CHAPTER 6.

I.

Our interpretation of ku shǎn (1-2), the valley spirit, is set forth in the Introduction on page 32. The quotation is, as Lieh Tse reports, attributed by the commentator T'u-T'au-Kien to Hwang Ti, the yellow emperor.

P'in (8) is the term in natural science to denote the female sex, mother sheep, hens, or mother birds, etc.

III.

The Chinese character following the word mien (1) "continually" is the sign of repetition. It means that the previous word, mien, should be read twice, and renders the word emphatic. The repetition is frequently translated by "very."

Pu ch'in (7-8), without effort, means it comes natural. It is a synonym of tsz' jan in Chapter 17, the two last characters, Chapter 23, i., characters 3-4, etc. Pu ch'in means "without external coercion," and tsz' jan "in self manner," i. e., according to one's own nature.

CHAPTER 7.

I.

St. Julien reads t'ien ti ch'ang chiu instead of t'ien ch'ang ti chiu.

The characters 5 13 are the subject of the following sentence 14-19. The words 5-12 which in themselves form a sentence, are summed up by che (13), "that," which in the analogous English construction would be placed at the beginning of the sentence.

Puh tsz' shang (16-18) "not self live," i. e., they live not for the purpose of self; they are unselfish.

Stanislas Julien reads ch'ien for ch'ang (21), "long," viz. long and lasting.

II.

The lesson of this chapter, which is summed up in the words: "the sage puts his person behind and his person will be preserved," reminds us of Christ's word Matth. xxiii. 12, and also Matth. x. 39 (= xvi. 25; Luke, ix. 24; xvii. 33; John, xii. 25).

CHAPTER 8.

I.

St. Julien here translates shan (6), goodness, as a verb, "to be good, to excel." According to him, we should translate "The water excels in benefiting," etc. The position of shan before the verb li, makes it an adverb, viz., "well" or "in a good way." The English "well" has lost its original meaning as an adverb for "good" by frequent use, or at least, is less significant than "in a good way" or "in goodness," wherefore the latter translation has been preferred as coming nearer the sense of the original.

The words pu chǎng (11-12), "it quarreleth not," reminds us of 1 Cor. xii. 4-7, and of Christ's blessing of the meek (Matth. v. 5).

II.

This sentence reads literally: "It dwells, ch'u (1), in the place, su (5) which is shunned, wu (9), by the multitudes, chung jan chi (2-4). The word su, however, is the relative pronoun, "he who," or "there where." Thus the sentence reads in smoother English: "It dwells in a place which all the people avoid," etc. This means that water always seeks the lowest level. Water, like the hermit, who lives in the wilderness, is distinguished by lowliness, setting an example of unselfish effort.

Chi (8) means to approach, in the sense of coming near in similarity.

III.

Shan (2), "good, or goodness," means when used as a verb "to deem good, to be satisfied with, to love, to prefer, to choose." The subject remains the same as before, viz., "superior goodness."

Yuen (6), "eddies," means a place in the current where the water is in commotion, which here illustrates warmth of sentiment.

The word shi (16) is any kind of business, duty, or activity.

Tung (19) (motion or movement) means "in its own course." Goodness and the waves of water move in rhythm (shi).

IV.

For fu wei (1-2), "since, whereas," see Chapter 2, vii. 1-2.

CHAPTER 9.

II.

Strauss interprets t'ang (4), "hall," as being in contrast to "treasury or safe." Treasures cannot be protected in a public hall which is accessible to anybody. In that case the pronoun chi (6) would not refer to t'ang, hall, but to chin yuh (1-2), treasures.

III.

This passage reminds us of the proverb : "Pride goeth before a fall."

The Way of Heaven or Heaven's Reason t'ien chi tao (15-17) must be identified with what Lao-Tze in chapter I. calls chang tao, "eternal reason."

CHAPTER 10.

I.

The word 'tsai (1) means a year, a revolution, but with changed accent tsai it means to contain, to convey, to sustain. (Williams, S. D., p. 941.)

The word ying (2) (see Williams, S. D., p. 1107) has given great trouble to the interpreters. As a noun it means "a soldier's camp," as a verb, "to plan, to regulate, to arrange, or to organize." To regulate the soul means to keep it disciplined.

Some commentators replace the word ying by huan, which means the spiritual soul in contrast to the animal soul. On this basis, Stanislas Julien translates : "L'âme spirituelle doit commander à l'âme sensitive." V. v. Strauss translates : "Wer dem Geiste die Seele einergiebt." Harlez translates : "Traitant convenablement l'être intellectuel qui habite (en soi)."

All these translations are forced and do not justify the interpolation made by the commentators. We prefer to retain the original words and translate them as literally as possible. It gives a better sense than when we interpret the word ying in the sense of huan. We take the first two words, "sustaining" and "disciplining" as synonymous.

P'oh (3), the animal soul, or the senses, as contrasted to reason. (Williams, S. D., p. 711.)

The words, "by embracing unity one cannot be disintegrated," are explained by the commentators to mean that unity is preserved by the assistance of the Tao. As to becoming free from disintegration, the reader is referred to chapters 22 and 39, where Lao-Tze speaks of embracing unity.

The present passage has given rise among Taoists to the idea that Lao-Tze believed in the possibility of finding an elixir of life.

The common significance of the word chwen (9) is "to give special attention to," but some interpreters interpret it to mean "hard to subdue." Stanislas Julien and Victor von Strauss follow this view and translate accordingly. We see no reason for a deviation from the original text.

Some manuscripts add after 'r<sup>h</sup> (15) child, the particle of exclamation hā (Oh!), which is also introduced between the characters 8 and 9 of this same chapter. Stanislas Julien also adds between characters 13 and 14 the word joh, which means "like." Since it is probable that the word "like" suggested by the context has been added by later commentators, we believe that the simpler and terser reading is the more original.

II.

Hüen lan (3-4), "mysterious beholding," or "profound intuition," which means by beholding the mysteries of the Tao. For lan see Williams, S. D., p. 502.

III.

 T'ien mǎn (1-2), "the heaven gates," are said to be the apertures of the body, the nostrils, the mouth, etc. But since Lao-Tze speaks of the sage if he be in charge of the government, would it not be more natural to understand the sentence in the sense that a wise ruler, if he lets every act of his be reasonable, can open and close the gates of heaven and dispense its bliss?

Two of my Japanese editions and St. Julien read, in place of wéi tsz' (6-7), "act as mother bird," wéi wu tsz', "not act like a mother-bird," which, however, gives sense only if construed as a question, viz., "can he in that case not be a mother-bird?" If Lao-Tze had written wu tsz', he would probably have added either hū or tsai, or some particle of exclamation. We prefer the reading wéi tsz'.

IV.

These same sentences are repeated in chapter 51

The word ch'ang (13) means "long," "to be long," "to cause to be long." In the second sense it means "to prolong life," or "to raise," and also, "to be higher than others," "to excel." The translator is free to interpret the word either as "he excels but does not rule," or "he raises but does not rule."

The character tsai (16), "to govern," is derived from the signs "shelter" and "bitter," denoting the slaughtering of animals. It means also "to slaughter; to skin or dress dead animals and prepare for food; to fashion." Thus, the word denotes a method of ruling in the most ruthless sense of the word.

CHAPTER II.

 This chapter is interesting, because it exhibits an instance in which a subtle thinker wrestles with one of the main problems of philosophy. Mankind as a whole is materialistic and appreciates only the amount of things. They know little, or nothing, of the paramount importance of form. They measure, and weigh, and try to express everything (as a modern philosopher, the main representative of agnosticism, has it) in terms of "matter and motion only." They appreciate quantity, not quality. They overlook that configuration, external shape as well as internal structure, are at the bottom of all realities. And form is a quality of existence quite different from either matter or motion. Lao-Tze dimly feels that matter and motion do not explain reality. Nor is there any advantage in masses and quantities. That which gives value to things is their form, and form always involves boundary or limits. He does not state the solution of the problem, but he sees that the partial absence of matter is an essential feature of things that have been shaped into vessels of usefulness; and thus the ancient saying of the Greek sages is verified, "the part is greater than the whole."<sup>1</sup>

CHAPTER 12.

I.

 The five colors according to the Chinese are blue, red, yellow, white, and black; the five notes are called kong, shang, kid, chi, and yü, which correspond to our c, d, e, g, a, omitting the fourth and the seventh. See St. Julien's and Strauss's notes to the twelfth chapter.

II.

The word fang (17), "checked," denotes an impediment, a hindrance, an obstacle. In the same sense the Buddhists use the term "hindrance" as an equivalent of temptation.

III.

The term fu (6) "the inner," which means also stomach and soul, stands here in contrast to the visible, the outer. The same word is used in Chapter 3, iv. 12 in contrast to sin, "heart," as the seat of passions.

CHAPTER 13.

I.

This passage presents some grammatical difficulties. Julien translates: "Son corps lui pèse comme une grande calamité!" The commentators, among them Su Chêh, declare that the sentence must be construed not in the order as it stands: "Kwei ta hwan joh shan" (esteem grand distress like body"), but "Kwei shan joh ta hwan" ("esteeming body [is] like grand distress"). Other translators either overlook or neglect the hint of the commentators. Chalmers translates: "Dignity and disaster are as one's person." Legge: "Honor and calamity [would seem] to be regarded as personal conditions [of the same kind]." Strauss: "Hohheit ist so grosse Plage wie der Körper." Harlez: "[Que] la grandeur [soit] une cause de grands soucis comme le corps même [quant à soi même]." The interpretation of Chalmers, Legge, Strauss, and Harlez seems probable enough, but we must consider first that kwei is as much here a verb as it is in iv. 2 of the same chapter, where in comment upon the present quotation the phrase kwei i shan" ("to esteem as the body") is used. In iv., as much as in i., the position of the object is at the end of the sentence, which seems odd to us but is natural in Chinese where this transposition possesses much force.

III.

The word ché (14) "the one," or "that," changes the whole preceding sentence, viz., "the reason why I have great anxiety," into a noun in somewhat the same way as does the English conjunction "that," which, however, begins the sentence, while the Chinese ché stands at the end. In the present case ché will naturally remain untranslated.

Wei (14) is used here as a conjunction and may be translated "on that account," or "it is due to the fact that."

IV.

The use of ché (8), "the one," changes (as in iii. 14) the preceding clause into a noun which here may be translated by "he," thus: "He (8) who when administering (5) the empire (6-7) esteems it (2) as (3) his own body (4)," etc.

V.

This passage is a repetition of the preceding sentence, except that kwei, "he esteems," is replaced by ngai, "he loves." Although all the editions at my disposal and probably all the manuscripts extant contain the repetition, we have not the slightest doubt that it is an interpolation which must at a very early date have slipped into the text. We have preserved the passage in the Chinese text and in the transliteration for the sake of completeness, but we omit it in the translation where it would simply puzzle the reader.

CHAPTER 14.

I.

 The fourteenth Chapter has given rise to an interesting theory which was first propounded by the Jesuit missionary M. Abel Rémusat in his essay Sur la vie et les opinions de Lao-ts'eu published in the Mémoires de l'Académie Royale des inscriptions et belles lettres, Vol. VII. Rémusat claims to have discovered in the Tao-Teh-King the name of Jehovah, expressed in the three words, i (7), hi (14), and wéi (21).

The meaning of the three words is as follows :

The word i (Williams, S. D., p. 276) means "to level, to equalise, to squat, to be at ease," as an adjective it means "equalising, subtle, placid," and also "colorless as the Taoists say reason is." The original meaning seems to be an indifferent or equalised state of mind, not colored by passions.

The word hi (Williams, S. D., p. 176) means "seldom, loose, thin, expectant," and Williams adds : "Deprived of sound as Lao-Tze says reason is."

The word wéi (Williams, S. D., p. 1050) means "small, minute, recondite, waning, fading away."

The text of the passage leaves little doubt that we have to translate i by "colorless," hi by "soundless," and wéi by "bodiless," (i. e., the Tao is that which if seized fades away from the touch).

Stanislas Julien devotes in his edition of the Tao-Teh-King several pages to a refutation of Rémusat's proposition which seems to be complete ; but Victor von Strauss, yielding to his theosophical inclinations, again espouses the lost cause of the French missionary and defends it with great ability.

The meaning of these sentences, which proclaim that the Tao is i, hi, and wéi, is obvious. Reason is distinct from sense-perception ; it can neither be seen, nor heard, nor touched by hands. Reason is, as we should say, pure form.

That Lao-Tze should have travelled to Palestine is as unlikely as that Israelites should have travelled to China in the sixth century B. C. There are Jews now living in China (concerning whom see Williams in his work The Middle Kingdom, and various notes in the Chinese Repository); but they immigrated, according to their own traditions, under the Han dynasty. Should Lao-Tze, after all, have heard of the God of the Hebrews, and should he have intended to speak of him he would certainly have made a clear and unequivocal statement. Nor is there any similarity of sound between the tetragram jhvh, which was pronounced yahveh, and the three words i, hi, wéi. So long as there is no better evidence than the vague arguments offered by Rémusat and Strauss, we cannot but look upon their theory as fantastical, fascinating though it be.

While we do not hesitate to say that the idea of identifying the characters i-hi-wéi with je-ho-vah has no foundation whatever, we do not, of course, deny that Lao-Tze's views of the Divinity that shapes our ends, possess in one respect at least a great similarity to Christian doctrines. Both are trinitarian. For further details on Lao-Tze's trinitarianism see the comments on Chapter 42.

II.

 The sense of this sentence appears paradoxical, because one would expect that on a superficial consideration a difficult problem might appear clear, but by further inquiry into its deeper complications we will find it obscure. Lao-Tze says the very opposite. He says on a superficial consideration Reason is obscure; its principles do not appear to be clear; but when we inquire into the problem and become acquainted with the depth of its meaning it becomes clear and all obscurity vanishes. The passage reminds us of St. Augustine's saying, that Christianity is like a stream, in which a lamb can wade, while an elephant must swim.

I understand Lao-Tze to mean that the Tao gives food for thought to the immature as well as to the sage. The immature may think that there are no difficulties and that everything is plain, but there are intricacies of which they do not dream; and the sage when pondering on it may be inclined to think that there is no possibility of arriving at a satisfactory solution; but he should not give up, for after all, the Tao is not incomprehensible; it is obviously simple and plain.

Therefore Lao-Tze warns the former, the superficial, that even to a superficial investigation it will offer difficulties rendering the Tao obscure: and the latter, the profound thinkers, that in spite of all intricacies the Tao is clear throughout.

IV.

Wu chwang (14-15) literally means "the not having form."

The difficulty for Lao-Tze in expressing his thought lies in the fact that the word "form," chwang (17), is commonly used as bodily shape and not in the sense of pure form.

VI.

Tao-chi (16-17), the thread of the Tao, is explained by the commentators as the initial thread, which suggests the translation 'cue.'

CHAPTER 15.

II.

The guest is reserved in the presence of his host (23-27).

Julien omits the pronoun ch'i (25, 37, 42, 47). The omission does not affect the meaning of the passage.

III

Su (15), Stanislas Julien reads: "Through long stirring."

IV.

The meaning of sin ch'ing (15-16) seems doubtful. It may mean "increasingly perfected," or "newly finished," or "stylishly fashioned." For sin see Williams, S. D., p. 806; for ch'ing, p. 77.

CHAPTER 16.

II.

Tsoh (21), "to invent, to stimulate, to arouse." Here used in the reflective sense: "to rise." (Williams, S. D., p. 1005.)

CHAPTER 17.

I

Stanislas Julien omits pu (4), "not," which is contained in one of my Japanese editions. The context requires the negation, and its omission would render the whole chapter unintelligible. The omission of the negation, however, dates back to olden times and the commentators have endeavored to explain the sense as well as they could. Lo Hi Ching says: "The great rulers let the people notice so little of their administration that they knew of them their mere existence and nothing more." The similarity of the character pu, "not," and hia, "inferior," sufficiently accounts for a copyist's mistake.

II.

The word jan (16) is used to change the preceding word tsz into an adverb, in the same way as the French "ment," or the English "ly," changes adjectives into adverbs. "Selflike," accordingly, means autonomous, independent, free. It implies that they can live according to their own nature, without being interfered with.

CHAPTER 18.

I.

 The six relatives are: father, mother, older brother, younger brother, wife, and child. The term "six relatives" means all the members of a family.

Chia (21) is what is within doors: "the household, the family." (Williams, S. D., p. 351.)

CHAPTER 19.

II.

The compound i wéi (4-5) means "to consider, to regard, to deem." (Williams, S. D., p. 1047.)

Wan (6), "culture, schooling."

CHAPTER 20.

I.

 The Chinese possess two affirmations wei (5) and o (8); the former is an unequivocal, the latter a hesitating assent. The former is definite and should be used by men and boys. The latter indicates modesty and should be used by women and girls. This distinction is made according to the rules of Chinese propriety, but Lao-Tze deems it unessential.

This interrogative particle (12) at the end of the sentence indicates that the preceding "how much" is to be interpreted in the sense "very little indeed"; while ho joh (19-20) may be translated "how greatly."

II.

Su wéi (3-4), viz., that which is an object of the people's fear.

According to the commentators speaking on the words 1-8, the sages must also fear what all the people fear, which is either law and punishments, or the government and rulers, or life and death, or evil in general. Commentator H. (as quoted by Julien) says "the people ought to fear moral evil, especially temptations, viz., "music, pleasures, riches, and luxury." Su Chêh says that while the sage does not attach himself to life, he will nevertheless observe the laws of the country and respect the authorities in power.

The passage hwang hi ch'i wéi yang tsai! (9-14) is interpreted by some commentators to mean that the comprehension of the sages is unlimited. Su Chêh explains hwang (9) as "extension," and refers the pronoun ch'i to "sages," saying that while the intelligence of the masses is limited, the knowledge of the sages is boundless and its potentialities cannot be fathomed. Julien translates: "Ils s'abandonnent au désordre et ne s'arrêtent jamais." Harlez: "O misère qui n'est point encore à son plus haut term." Chalmers: "But alas they will never cease from their madness." Strauss: "Die Verfinsterung, oh dass sie noch nicht aufhört!" Legge: "How wide and without end is the range of questions (asking to be discussed)!"

Williams defines hwang (9), p. 250, by "wild, barren, waste; unproductive, deserted; without restraint, reckless; . . . blasted; a jungle; a famine, dearth; . . . to frustrate." We refer ch'i (11), "their," not to sages, but (as grammatically it ought to be construed) to the next preceding noun, which is desolation, and translate: "This desolation, Oh! it has not yet reached its limit."

III.

The word chao (33) means a sign which the tortoise shell gives when roasted over a fire for the sake of receiving a favorable omen.

CHAPTER 21.

I.

The word k'ung (1) means "a hole, or hollow." It forms the first part of Confucius's name. In the present place, it is explained by the interpreters to mean grand on account of vastness.

The particle wéi (13), "then, only; is, or will," is frequently added to complete the sound of a sentence and need not be translated in that case.

The words hwang (14), "abstruse," and hu (16), "elusive," are difficult to translate. Hwang means "wild, unready, not yet done"; and hu "to forget, to disregard," or as an adverb, "unexpectedly." Reason is characterised by Lao-Tze as something which is not ready-made, but presents itself as an abstruse problem full of difficulties to be worked out; and the solution is not a direct answer, not yes or no. It is too intricate to admit a simple statement of its nature.

That the Tao (as stated in 21-23) has in it images reminds one of Plato's ideas.

CHAPTER 22.

I.

There are two forms of pi (10), both of which mean "tattered, torn, worn, deteriorated as an old coin." See W. S. D., pp. 675 and 676. St. Julien and one Japanese edition use the simpler form that omits the "kung" (radical 55) underneath.

This chapter reminds us of Isaiah xl. 4, where we read: "Every valley shall be exalted, and every mountain and hill shall be made low: and the crooked shall be made straight, and the rough places plain;" and also of the makarism that those that mourn shall be comforted (Math. v. 4).

CHAPTER 23.

I.

The combination hi yen (1-2), "seldom to speak," is commonly translated "to be taciturn."

The phrase tsz' jan (3-4) means "in the manner of self," i.e., according to one's own nature, or briefly "natural." See Chapter 17 et alias.

Shu Chêh says: "The words of Tao, though they be few, strike home because they are natural."

II.

The Tetzugaku Kwan edition replaces the passages "who pursues his business with virtue, the one," by "the virtue-man," and "who pursues his business with loss, the one," by "the loss-man." The whole passage reads as follows: "Therefore who pursues his business with reason, the one, the reason-man, is identified with reason. The man of loss is identified with loss."

Whether this is a simplification of the other reading, or vice versa, whether the more complete version has been rendered more uniform by copyists is an idle question. The sense is the same in either case.

III.

Julien omits the character loh, "to rejoice," in the sentences tao yih loh teh chi (5-9), teh yih loh teh chi (12-18), and shih yih loh teh chi (21-27), which appears in all the other texts at my disposal, and translates "Celui qui s'identifie au Tao, gagne le Tao," etc. It appears that the pronoun chi at the end of these three passages must be referred to the preceding nouns, tao, teh, and shih which indicates an anteposition of the object. (About the rules of inversion see Gabelentz, Anfg., pp. 73-75.) We translate therefore "The Tao, in addition, he enjoys to obtain it," etc., etc. To refer chi to the sage, viz., to him who identifies himself with Reason, virtue, and loss, is grammatically not impossible, but not probable. We can understand that Lao-Tze personifies the Tao and says that "the Tao enjoys being embraced"; we can even allow that he personifies Teh, "Virtue"; but how improbable is a personification of "Loss."

The word shih (21), "loss," is conceived by Julien, Chalmers, Strauss, Plänckner, and Alexander in the sense of moral deficiency, which, however, is not warranted by the Chinese and Japanese interpretations of the text. Wang Pi says: "The sage endures everything and can therefore identify himself with everything,"—even with loss.

Chalmers translates "Him who is identified with Tau, (the community) of Tau also rejoices to receive." Strauss agrees with Chalmers in his construction of the Chinese grammar, but he personifies the Tao, saying: "Wer eins wird mit Tao, auch Tao freut's ihn zu bekommen."

CHAPTER 24.

II.

The word hing (9), commonly "behavior, elements," etc., is in this connexion explained as "the bodily organism; the system."

The pronoun chi (13), "them," refers to offal of food and excrement in the system (6-9), not directly to the self-approving, self-boasting, and self-glorifying man.

The words pu ch'u (18-19), "he does not stay or dwell," mean, the man who has reason, has no use for the self-displaying man: he has nothing to do with him.

CHAPTER 25.

I.

Chalmers translates the words 1-4, "There is something chaotic in nature;" Julien: "Il est un Etre confus;" Harlez: "L'être était indiscernable mais complet;" Strauss: "Es gab ein Wesen unbegreiflich vollkommen." The words hwun ch'äng (3-4) belong together; hwun means "mixed as is a turbid current containing all kinds of ingredients," and ch'äng means "in completion."

II.

Ming (16) is the proper name, tsz (17) means the title that expresses the character. The distinction is thoughtful and suggestive.

III.

Ch'iang (1), "constrained," may be passive or reflexive, "should I be constrained," or "should I endeavor."

IV.

Wang (8), "royalty," or "the king," is here apparently used in the sense of t'ien-tsz', "the son of heaven," the guardian of the moral order on earth. As such he is the representative of mankind in general, and in pointing out the interpretation of the four great ones the term wang, "king," is replaced by jan (v. 1), "man." That Lao-Tze does not think highly of the sovereign that ruled at his time appears from the concluding paragraph of the following chapter, where he is called "the master of the ten thousand chariots."

V.

The words tsz' jan (12-13), "self-like," which are commonly translated by "natural," mean here that "reason follows its own nature," i. e., its standard is intrinsic.

CHAPTER 26.

I.

The expression pu li tsz' chung (8-11) is a phrase denoting, "Not to depart from the baggage-waggon," to maintain a grave and composed attitude. Chung means "weighty" or "grave."

CHAPTER 27.

I.

The compound ch'eu ts'eh (14-15), "computing slips," means abacus or counting machine.

II.

Julien translates the word sih (23) by "double," on the authority of one of the commentators who explains it by chong, "double." The word sih means (1) the lining of garments; (2) stealthy, or to steal; (3) to inherit, etc. We understand the word to mean "the inside," or "that which is not at once seen."

III.

The word tsz' (17) means "capital," "wealth," "treasure," "investment," and is used in the same sense as these words are used in English.

CHAPTER 28.

I.

Both words, k'i (i. 10 and 14) and ku (iii. 10 and 14), mean "valley" or "river-bed."

II.

The unlimited, or wu chi (22-23), is the absolute, i. e., the Tao.

IV.

The word chi (5) means literally "vessel;" but as jade becomes useful and acquires value only after having been shaped into a vessel, chi is directly used in the sense of "useful person."

Pu san ts'eh wéi ch'i (1-5) may mean, "By scattering simplicity he makes of himself a vessel of usefulness," but the following sentence where the pronoun chi (9) can have reference only to chi (5), "vessel" or "vessels," indicates that the sage makes of the people vessels of usefulness."

CHAPTER 29.

I.

 The proposition, "The state is a divine vessel" (15-18), means in Aristotelian terms the state is φύσει not θεσει; or as Christian teachers of political economy (such men as Stahl) would say, "it is God-created not man-made." Nowadays we should say, "The state is of natural growth according to the eternal laws that condition the evolution of mankind, and not the product of a social contract." (See the author's pamphlet The Nature of the State.)

CHAPTER 30.

III.

The word i (12) which frequently occurs as a finite particle in the sense "that is all," "that finishes it," is here used as a verb, "it ends," "it ceases," "it is gone."

CHAPTER 31.

I.

The word chu (17), "to dwell," "to attend to," "to be satisfied with," is frequently used in the sense "to be attached to," "to use," "to employ," "to have dealings with."

II.

Chiün tsz' (1-2), "the master thinker," or "royal philosopher," is a synonym for holy man.

III.

The particle i' (25) "therefore," is omitted in some editions.

IV.

We have omitted this passage from the translation of the text. It reads as follows:

"In propitious events the left is exalted. In evil events the right is exalted. The assistant army-leader sits to the left. The superior army-leader sits to the right. This indicates that the position of superior power is here as in the arrangement of funeral ceremonies. The slaughter of many multitudes of men must be deplored with sorrow and lamentation, and the conqueror in a battle must be placed according to the funeral ceremonial."

This whole section, and perhaps also the sections ii. and iii., are spurious. Neither is the language Lao-Tze's terse style, nor are the words such as were used in his days. The titles "assistant army leader," or "adjutant general" and "superior army leader" or "chief general" do not occur in any one of the older books and belong unquestionably to a later age. It is probable that some commentator (probably Wang Pi) wrote the passage in explanation of the chapter, and the copyists made the mistake of embodying the gloss into the text.

CHAPTER 32.

I.

The word pin (22), "to pay homage," is defined by Williams, "a visitor who comes willingly to pay his respects," "to submit," "to acknowledge," "to come under civilising influences."

II.

The passage shi chi yiu ming (1-4) presents some difficulties. Literally it means "In the beginning, when administering (or arranging, governing) [then there is] the having name." Julien translates: "Dès que le tao se fut divisé, il eut un nom;" he explains chi as differentiation and interprets the words to mean that the Tao began to divide itself. Legge translates, "As soon as it proceeds to action, it has a name." Harlez, "Quand (le Tao) commença à former (les êtres) il y eut alors des noms." Strauss: "Der da anhebt zu schaffen hat einen Namen." Chalmers leaves us in doubt whether this sentence refers to the Tao. He translates: "If he should ever begin to regulate things with distinctions of names, he would then be getting a name." There seems to be no doubt that Tao must be supplied as the subject of the sentence, for there is a contrast between the unnameable and the nameable. The Tao in itself is unnameable, but it becomes nameable, that is to say determinable as the immanent principle of order in concrete existences, i. e., the Tao is definite as soon as it is practically applied, either in the creation of the world where it appears as cosmic order, or anywhere in logic, arithmetic, mathematics, or any possible system of pure reason. The word shi, "at first," "in the beginning," is frequently used in the sense of the Hebrew bereshith, and the Greek ἐν ἀρχῇ, viz., in the beginning of the world, but it may also be translated by "at first," "at once," "as soon as." The word shi (2), "management," refers mainly to the administration of a civilised government, but may mean any kind of order. Grammatically it would be not impossible to translate: "When in the beginning (1) governments (2) [were instituted], there were (3) names [given to the people]. When names (5) in addition (6) already (7) existed (8), then (9) in addition (10) [people] would (11) learn (12) where to stop [viz., to refrain their passions] (13). Knowing (14) where to stop (15), that is why (16-17) there are no (18) dangers" (19), i. e., the people would enjoy safety. While this translation would be admissible in any other writer, we must consider that wu ming is a favorite and definite expression of Lao Tze's terminology, and the context requires to interpret the passage as a continuation of the first paragraph of the chapter, which brings out the contrast between (1) the absolute Reason, the Tao as it is in itself while it remains nameless, and (2) the applied Reason, the immanent principle of rationality, which is the formative factor of existence.

Tai (19) means "danger" or "risk." The phrase pu tai (18-19) is frequently used by Lao-Tze, signifying "a condition of safety." The Tao cannot fail or be exhausted, its possibilities are unlimited.

CHAPTER 33.

III.

Sheu (6), "eternal life," or "longevity," is the first of the five happinesses and is never missing in Chinese congratulations. It touches the Chinese heart perhaps more deeply than ours. The context sufficiently proves that sheu does not mean merely "long life," but life eternal, life beyond death.

CHAPTER 36.

The word wei, "secret," which occurs in the heading and in ii. 3, means originally "a slight shower of rain." It is interpreted to denote that which is hazy or hidden as in a mist. Julien, Strauss, Legge translate wei as a verb, "to enlighten or enlightenment," and ming as its object, i. e., "hiding the light." Chalmers translates "secret understanding;" and Harlez, "the understanding of the mysterious.

III.

 We translate wei ming (3-4), "the secret's explanation." The secret is that the tender and weak conquer the hard and the strong. The reason is that the tender are growing, while the hard have lost the elasticity of life. Therefore the people ought not to be made warlike; for if they are warlike, if they are familiar with the use of arms, they will soon perish like fish that are taken out of the water.

Li ch'i (9-10), "excellent or sharp tools," always means arms or weapons.

CHAPTER 37.

II.

The word ting (17) means "tranquil," "secure," "fixed," "steady," etc. Then "a trance" or "rapture." In Buddhism it denotes the "fixed condition of mind," "peace of soul," "a state of contemplation."

CHAPTER 38.

I.

"Unvirtue" or pu teh (3-4) is not merely the absence of virtue but implies the blame of actual immorality. In the same way pu siang, "unblessings" (Chapter 78, ii. 17-18), means not a mere absence of bliss but positive curses.

This chapter undoubtedly criticises the Confucian method of preaching ethical culture without taking into consideration the religious emotions. Lao-Tze maintains that genuine virtue does not boast of being virtue, and that the show of virtue actually betrays a lack of virtue. The paradoxical language in which this idea is clothed is characteristic of the old philosopher and will serve to elucidate similar expressions of his, especially his maxim of wu wéi as that not-doing by means of which everything can be done.

According to Confucius the highest virtue is justice which doles out rewards to the good and punishments to the bad; but according to Lao-Tze that disposition of heart which meets both the good and the bad with the same goodness is alone true virtue (see Chapter 49 and 63); for even the superior justice as exercised in the imperial courts of the country is full of pretension and self-assertion. The same is true of the rules of propriety and ceremonies which play so important a part in Confucian ethics.

V.

Chang (4), W. S. D., p. 25, is a Chinese measure consisting of 10 ch'ih (grasping hands), which is of about 10 feet, reckoned to be 141 English inches. Chang fu (4-5) means "husband" (see also W. S. D., p. 142) in the same sense as fu alone which otherwise means "any distinguished man," or "one who can help." Finally, ta chang fu (3-5) denotes "the great man of affairs;" or "one fit to manage."

The contrast between heu (8), "solidity," and po (12), "externality" or their covering, and shih (15) "fruit," and hwa (19), "flower," sufficiently explains that flower is meant in the sense of mere show.

CHAPTER 39.

V.

Chi shu ch'ê wu ch'ê (2-6) means literally, "Let (2) go to pieces (3) a carriage (4) it is no [longer] (5) a carriage" (6). Chi is a causative auxiliary verb; it means "to go," "to let go," "to let." Shu, as a verb, means "to enumerate"; as a noun, "details which are or can be enumerated."

This chapter contains an idea that is more important than may seem at first sight, and may briefly be called the "importance of oneness." A carriage is not the sum total of its parts; its parts must be properly combined into a unity in order to make a carriage. The same is true of heaven and earth, of spiritual beings, of the government, and all other useful institutions.

It is strange that the same simile of a chariot is used in a similar sense in the Milinda pañha (the "Questions of King Milinda")<sup>1</sup> for proving both the importance of unities and their absolute non-existence if considered as independent things in themselves, as âtmans or ego-entities. The Buddhist sage Nāgasena says: "My fellow-priests, address me as Nāgasena, but this is an appellation, for there is no âtman [no independent ego-entity] here to be found." The King answers: "If there is no ego-entity, pray tell me who is it who performs acts, who eats, who drinks, who thinks, who keeps the precepts, who commits sins, who acquires merit . . . ? What, then, is Nāgasena? Is Nāgasena the hair? the nails? the teeth? the lungs . . . ? The sensation? the perception? the dispositions? the consciousness?" . . . When all these questions are denied, the King concludes: "I fail to discover any Nāgasena. Verily now, venerable sir, Nāgasena is an empty sound. You speak a falsehood, a lie: there is no Nāgasena." The Buddhist sage now turns the table and asks the King whether he came on foot or in his chariot. "I came in a chariot," replies the King, whereupon Nāgasena asks: "What is the chariot?" enumerating all its parts. "Is the axle the chariot? the wheels? the box? the yoke? the reins?" . . . And when Milinda denies these questions, Nāgasena repeats the words of the King, only substituting "chariot" for "Nāgasena"; he says: "Your Majesty, although I question you very closely, I fail to discover any chariot. The word chariot is an empty sound. Your majesty speak a falsehood, a lie. There is no chariot." . . . The king defends himself, saying: "Venerable sir, I speak no lie; the word 'chariot' is but a way of speaking, a term, an appellation, a name for pole, axle, wheels, chariot-box, etc." Then Nāgasena draws the conclusion, that the unity of a person is just as real as that of a chariot, and yet there is no person in itself, no âtman, no ego in the absolute sense.

The problem of unity has also been treated by Plato in a discussion of the one and many. For quotations, see in the index of Fowett's translation, the references collected sub voce "one." Vol. V., p. 479.

CHAPTER 41.

II.

The term ju (26), "to put to shame," is a common term in the Chinese style of propriety. When we would say, "You have done me the honor," they in their overpoliteness use the word ju and say, "You have disgraced yourself."

CHAPTER 42.

II.

The Chinese relative su (3), "that which," immediately precedes the verb; we say, "that which is detested by the people," while the Chinese say, jǎn ch'í su wu (1-4), "the people's, that which is detested."

 The trinity of which Lao-Tze speaks is the yín (17), the yang (20) and the ch'í (22), viz., the negative principle, the positive principle, and the breath of life or the spirit. In their unity they are the Tao. The resemblance which this trinity bears to the trinity doctrines in general is no evidence that Taoism has been derived from Brahmanism. Nor is it a triple personality. Lao-Tze's trinity doctrine is quite abstract and philosophical; it may be based upon older teachings, or it may be his own interpretation of the traditional views of the yang and yín, in combination with the idea of the ch'í, all three of which are contained in the Tao as the all-comprising Rationality of existence, the divine Logos, the highest unifier, the principle of oneness for all thoughts and things.

The Chinese trinity, being the duality of yang and yín organised into a higher unity under the harmonious influence of Ch'í, is regarded as the source of all existence, and its symbol (which is shown in the adjoined illustration) possesses a deep religious significance for the Chinese heart.

III.

The phrase chiao fu (20-21), "a doctrine's father," is explained by the great majority of commentators as "the root of a doctrine," or its "philosophical foundation." Abel Remusat translates, "C'est moi qui suis, à cet égard, le père de la doctrine" (L. l., p. 32). His translation is literally correct, and he either translated the words as he found them or followed Teh Ts'ing (commentator H. of Julien) who is the only one who accepts the literal meaning of the passage. But he explains fu, "father," as mo-to, "the announcer," literally "wooden bell," which is the bell that was sounded in announcing the arrival of dignitaries. Morrison explains it as the bell that was rung to call the people to service to receive instruction.

CHAPTER 43.

I.

Both words ch'i (6) and ch'ing (7) mean "to gallop." Two synonyms are frequently used to make the idea emphatic, or, if the sound of one happens to possess too many meanings, to render it unequivocal.

II.

This passage appears absurd, but we must consider that non-existence is the formal aspect which is conditioned by the Tao. The sentence means, "that which has no concrete existence," "the immaterial reality," i. e., the laws of formal relations enter into the impenetrable.

CHAPTER 44.

I.

Lao-Tze apparently means (words 6-10) that hoarded goods invite plunder and thus lead to loss. In our days of an intense utilisation of capital we would say that hoarding is in itself a loss.

CHAPTER 45.

Nishimura, the Japanese editor of the Tao-Teh-King regards these passages, i. and ii., as poetry, not as a quotation but as written by Lao-Tze; and he undoubtedly follows a good Chinese authority. The lines sound like verses although the rhymes are very imperfect, at least if we follow the Chinese pronunciation of Williams; but it is not impossible that they may have been good rhymes according to Lao-Tze's own pronunciation. Legge, too, translates them as verses.

CHAPTER 48.

II.

Shi (7) means "business" in the modern sense of the word, denoting "business push and manipulation or artful dexterous management." (See 8, iii., 15.) Here it means "political push, or artifices, diplomacy."

CHAPTER 49.

II.

Legge deems it advisable to change the traditional reading, here replacing teh (13), "virtue," by teh, "to obtain, to get," and translates "Thus all get good."

CHAPTER 50.

 Su Cheh says "Nature knows neither life nor death. Its going forth we call life, and its coming in we call death." The chapter sets forth the idea that there are people who pursue the path of life, others who pursue the path of death, and again others who are now under the sway of life's attractions and now under the doom of death's influence. The sage belongs to none of these three classes of men; he is above life and death, and therefore he has no death-place, i. e., he does not belong to the realm of death; which means he is invulnerable, he cannot be touched by death.

I.

Tu (7) means "a follower" (see W. S. D., p. 919). The same phrases "life's followers" and "death's followers" occur a second time in Chapter 76, where there is no doubt about the meaning. Accordingly there is little probability here that we must interpret it to mean "ministers of life and of death" in the sense of some unknown mythological beings, or death and life-bringing angels.

Lu-Tze, one of the commentators, interprets the word yiü (9), "there are" or "have," in the sense of "and"; accordingly we should translate: "Life's followers are thirteen, death's followers are thirteen, and the death-places (or vulnerable spots) of men in their movements are also thirteen." But who are these three times thirteen? The number thirteen does not play any part in Chinese philosophy, religion, and folklore. We are told by some that it means the 5 senses and the 8 apertures; by others the 3 souls, 7 spirits, 1 vital soul (or ch'i), 1 yin, and 1 yang. But these explanations are artificial and improbable! Julien, Harlez, and Strauss adopt the interpretation of shí yiu san in the sense of thirteen. Chalmers gives the preference to the translation "three in every ten," and Legge follows Chalmers. We have adopted the same interpretation. Three in ten, being repeated three times, makes nine in ten. The tenth in each ten would be the wise, i. e., the sage of whom the next sentence declares that he will not be endangered by rhinoceroses, tigers, or soldiers.

II.

The word kai (1), originally "a coarse grass used for thatching houses," then "a covering," is here a particle meaning "now then" or "for." The phrases kai yüeh, "now it is said" (quoted by Williams in his S. D., p. 308, first column, line 5) and, as we have it here, kai wän (1-2), "indeed I hear," are of common occurrence. The word kai must not be confounded with ho (W. S. D., p. 218) which is the same character only without the radical "plants" and means (1) to unite, (2) why not? intimating an alternative.

CHAPTER 53.

I.

The word shí (12), "assertion," means originally the hoisting of a banner; then it means "to give, to do, to use, to arrange." it is here used as a contrast to wu wei, "non-assertion."

Although this passage appears to be very simple, the translators differ greatly. Their versions are as follows:

Julien: "Si j'étais doué de quelque connaissance, je marcherais dans la grande Voie. La seule chose que je craigne, c'est d'agir."

Chalmers: "Would that I were possessed of sufficient knowledge to walk in the great Tao. Only the administration (of government) is a fearful responsibility."

Strauss: "Wenn ich hinreichend erkannt habe, wandle ich im grossen Tao; nur bei der Durchführung ist dies zu fürchten."

Legge: "If I were suddenly to become known (and put into a position to) conduct (a government) according to the great Tao, what I should be most afraid of would be a boastful display."

Harlez: "Si l'on me chargeait d'une fonction auxiliaire du gouvernement, ayant alors acquis les connaissances nécessaires, je marcherais dans la grande voie du Tao et je craindrais seulement de me répandre au dehors."

CHAPTER 55.

The word fu, "seal," in the heading means originally "Bamboo slips in pairs, made to give one half to each party." Then it means "a seal in two pieces which when joined proves its genuineness by matching." In their sense it is literally what the Greeks called σύμβολον, a "symbol" (from συν, "together," and βάλλειν, "to throw," i. e., "to piece together"). Finally the word acquired the meaning of the impression of a seal, and the warrant of genuineness. As a verb it means to testify, to verify.

I.

The character tsui (35), which is explained in the Kanghi, Vol. 31, p. 1, as "the privates of an infant," is referred to in W. S. D., p. 821, sub voce süen, "shrivelled, diminished." The character süen is, according to the Kanghi, another mode of writing tsui. Baby boys before emptying the bladder are frequently troubled with erections, which is here misinterpreted as a symptom of vigor.

The character tsing (37), consisting of "rice" and "pure," denotes (1) cleaned rice, then (2) the essence or best of anything; the spirit; and lastly (3) the germinating principle, or the semen of the male.

CHAPTER 56.

III.

The use of 'rh (5, 11, 16, 22, 26) is causative and progressive in this passage, which literally means "not can he be obtained and then thereby be loved and . . . discarded." Briefly, "he is inaccessible to love, enmity, etc."

CHAPTER 57.

II.

Li ch'i (12-13), "sharp tools, weapons." Li means also "useful, profitable." Legge interprets li in the sense of "use" and translates "the more implements to add to their profit that the people have, the greater disorder is there in the state and the clan."

CHAPTER 58.

I.

Chi (32), originally the gable of a roof, means "the extreme the utmost, the final outcome." Here it means "the catastrophe." Chi (32), "the extreme," must not be confounded with ch'i (42, i. 22) "the vital principle or breath of life." (See the author's "Chinese Philosophy," No. 30 of the "Religion of Science Library," p. 24; or The Monist, Vol. VI., No. 2, p. 211 ff.) Lao-Tze regards ch'i as the third element in the Trinity, which shapes all things. See Chapter 42.

CHAPTER 59.

II.

According to the commentators, kwo chi mu (18-20), "the mother of the country," is moderation.

CHAPTER 60.

II.

Julien reads kwéi (7), "ghosts," where the texts at my disposal read shan, "gods." See the words 16 and 22.

 This is a strange chapter as it speaks of ghosts and gods, who otherwise seem to find no room in the philosophy of Lao-Tze. Perhaps Lao-Tze simply assures his followers that so long as the government follows the great Tao, there is no need of fearing either ghosts or gods. But when grievous wrongs are done, superstitions appear and ghost-stories originate, the gods are said to curse the people, while the sages utter prophecies of ill omen and lamentation.

CHAPTER 61.

II.

Some commentators understand ts'ü (29) here as passive, "a small country by lowering itself to a great country is taken by the great country. But is this interpretation tenable? If great countries take small countries by stooping, and small countries are conquered by stooping, where is Lao-Tze's lesson about humility?

 States in a federative empire, such as was the Chinese empire in the days of Lao-Tze, grow powerful when they serve the common interests of the whole nation. It would be as impossible for great rivers to flow in high mountains as for great states not to be subservient to the universal needs of the people. Streams become naturally great when they flow in the lowlands where they will receive all the other rivers as tributaries. The largest states are not always the greatest states. A state acquires and retains the leadership not by oppressing the other states, but by humbly serving them, by flowing lower than they. This truth has been preached by Christ when he said: "Whosoever will be great among you, let him be your minister; and whosoever will be chief among you, let him be your servant." An instance in the history of China that illustrates Lao-Tze's doctrine, which at first sight appears as paradoxical as all his other teachings, is the ascendancy of the House of Cho, which under the humble but courageous Wu Wang succeeded the Shang Dynasty, whose last emperor, Chow Sin († 1122 B. C.) received the posthumous title Show, the abandoned tyrant. Other instances in history are the rise of Athens in Greece and of Prussia in Germany. Athens's ascendancy began when, in patriotic self-sacrifice, it served the cause of Greece, viz., of all the Greek states; and its decay sets in with the oppressions of the Athenian confederates, i. e., when Athens ceased to serve and began to use the resources of the Ionian confederacy for its own home interests.

Some commentators who find a contradiction in the passage that even the smaller states can conquer the great states by stooping (viz., by serving the interests of the whole empire) translate the second kwo (in ii. 31) not as the first kwo (in ii. 17) by "they conquer," but by the passive form "they are conquered." It is not probable that Lao-Tze should have used in the same chapter and in the same passage one and the same word in exactly the opposite sense.

III.

This passage reads literally: "The one is low (i. e., he stoops) to conquer, the other is low and conquers." Chalmers and Harlez accept this to be the sense of the passage. There is no reason, when the chapter is viewed in the light in which we interpret it, to put another meaning into the sentence. Julien translates: "C'est pourquoi les uns s'abaissent pour recevoir, les autres s'abaissent pour être reçus." He follows Sin-Kie-Fou who says that i ts'ü (4-5) "to conquer," and 'rh ts'ü (8-9) "to be conquered." Strauss follows Julien. Legge interprets the former ts'ü in the sense of gaining power, the latter in the sense of gaining adherents. He translates: "In the one case the abasement leads to gaining adherents, in the other case to procuring favor." This implies a contrast between "gaining adherents" and "gaining favor," which if it had been intended would have been expressed by different words. The contrast lies in the words hia i (3-4) and hia 'rh (7-8), which means "it is low through," or "for the purpose of," and "it is low and," etc.

CHAPTER 62.

IV.

Kung (3) means "clasping the hands over the breast, or holding reverently with both hands; bowing."

When speaking to the emperor, imperial ministers of China hold a large jade tablet before their mouths lest their breath should touch the son of heaven. Thus the phrase "holding in both arms for screening" means being an imperial minister. Professor Legge's translation of this passage is hardly tenable.

V.

The word ché (8), "that or the one," changes the whole preceding sentence into a noun. In a literal English translation we should change the order of the words and read: "What (9) indeed (10) is the where- (3) for [viz., the reason] of (2) the ancients (1) that (8) they esteemed (5) this (6) reason (7)."

In the place of yueh (12), "say," Julien reads jeh, "day" (W. S. D., p. 293), and translates, "without seeking it the whole day."

CHAPTER 63.

I.

Julien interprets the words ta siao to shao (10-13) as nouns, "the great, the small, the much, the little," and supplies the words "are the same to the sage."

CHAPTER 64

I.

Julien reads fang, "arrest," where we read wéi (18), "to do, to manage," and translates "Arrêtez le mal avant qu'il n'existe."

Hö pao chi mu (28-31) means "a tree which is so stout that it can only be embraced with both arms. Hö means "together, in union, a pair," pao means "to embrace, to hold, to grasp."

Tsu hia (50-51), "the underpart of the foot," means "the space underneath the foot, or a foot measure."

III.

The word fu (17), "he returns to," is conceived by Julien to mean "he opposes," and kwo (22) as "transgression." He translates the passage "il se préserve des fautes des autres hommes."

CHAPTER 65.

II.

Ch'ie shih (29-30 and 33-34), "standard, or model," is a compound of which both parts mean pattern. Ch'ie originally signifies a peculiarly graceful tree, and shih is a form or rule set up for imitation. The ch'ie-tree was planted upon the grave of Confucius in honor of the great teacher whom the Chinese as a nation, represented by both the government and the schools, officially worship as their highest ideal of propriety and morality.

III.

Julien reads the last sentence "naï chi ta shun, omitting yii (13), "to," and adding at the beginning of the sentence yan heu, "afterwards" (see W. S. D., pp. 285 and 175), viz., "après qu'on a acquis cette vertu." The word shun means "to follow, to be a disciple, to obey." The interpretation followership, in the sense of recognition, seems both probable and appropriate. Julien explains the word as submission, which of course the word means in the above sense, and believes the passage means that it will make people submissive, which will bring about a general peace. Accordingly he translates the sentence: "Par elle on parvient à procurer une paix générale."

CHAPTER 66.

I.

The word ché (10), "the ones," here again, as usually, sums up the whole sentence and changes it into a noun.

CHAPTER 67.

I.

 This passage is difficult because the sense remains doubtful. Some commentators make a stop between ta (6), "great," and sz' (7), "resemble," others construe ta as an adverb, "greatly," belonging to sz', "resemble." According to the former view we should translate: "In the world all say, I greatly resemble the unlikely;" according to the latter: "In the world all call me great; [but] I resemble the unlikely." The latter does not seem to agree with Lao-Tze's modesty; but if we consider that Confucius undertook a long journey to see the philosopher of Cho, we must conclude that he was indeed famous all over China, and the present proposition may be a mere statement of fact. Lao-Tze may have heard the people call him great until he grew sick of it and resented it by calling attention to his awkwardness. We must bear in mind that while Lao-Tze was modest and unassuming, he was at the same time conscious of the grandeur of the Tao which he represented in his philosophising. Therefore we interpret ngo (5), "I or me," in the sense of "I as a philosopher," or briefly "my philosophy, my Tao."

The word siao (9) means literally "to resemble, to be like;" and pu siao accordingly means "the unlike." Following Su-Chéh (or, as the French sinologue spells his name, Sou-tseu-yeou) Julien transliterates the word by "non-semblable, c'est à dire différent des êtres, des créatures"; but in the text he translates it "stupid." As in English, the words "likely" and "unlikely" possess the sense which according to the context the Chinese words siao and pu siao must have, we have retained this most literal translation in the text.

Wang Pî reads tao between ngo (5) and ta (6), an addition which naturally suggested itself. The Ho Shang Kung text reads simply ngo. Julien places a period after ta (6), "great."

II.

 In the first sentence of the chapter the text reads unequivocally ngo (i. 5), "I, me, or mine," but in the second sentence the text reads chi (ii. 12), "he, him, or his," etc., which is rarely, and only under exceptional conditions, used as a pronoun for the first person. This is the reason why it seemed more appropriate to change the subject. While the first sentence starts with a statement made personally by Lao-Tze of himself, he at once generalises the idea and continues in the third person.

The position of the subject after the predicate is unusual, perhaps for the purpose of emphasising the word si (13), "mediocrity."

III.

 The word pao (5), "treasure," means here moral character and we might translate the title by "the three virtues which constitute a man's worth."

CHAPTER 68.

I.

Shi or sz' (3) means now "a literary man," but in early times it meant "a warrior," "a military leader," "a general," in which sense it is also used in the Chinese chess for the figures that represent tsiang, our bishops, or the two advisers of the general, our king. See Williams, The Middle Kingdom, I., pp. 827-828.

CHAPTER 69.

I.

Plaenckner explains host as aggressor and guest as one who takes the defence.

Plaenckner ridicules Julien for making a coward of Lao-Tze and construes the sentence as follows: "I do not think of allowing myself to be thrown back a whole foot if I have gained an inch." Plaenckner may be a better soldier than Stanislas Julien, but the French professor probably understands Lao-Tze better than the German baron.

II.

Hing wu hing (3-5), "proceeding without proceeding," is analogous to wéi wu wéi, "acting non-action." It is difficult to understand how other translators could miss the sense which is quite clear. Julien translates: "C'est ce qui s'appelle n'avoir pas de rang à suivre," and Legge translates "Marshalling the ranks where there are no ranks."

By pao (26), "treasure," Lao-Tze means, as indicated in Chapter 67, "moral worth"; and a man's moral worth is constituted first of compassion; hence it is said in the next paragraph, that of two armies the tenderer one will conquer, because its moral worth is superior to the other one.

III.

K'ang ping (2-3) means "well-matched," i. e., equal in physical strength.

CHAPTER 70.

II.

Lao-Tze speaks of the Tao as tsung (11), "ancestor," and chiün (14), "master," meaning that it is the origin and ultimate authority of his words and deeds. How easily abstract ideas are personified! If Lao-Tze, who otherwise is so explicit in his views of the abstract nature of Reason, personifies the Tao, how natural does it appear to be that the idea of God has been personified among Jews and Christians.

The problem of the idea of God lies at the bottom of all the difficulties which at the present day render religious dogmas objectionable to those who are trained in the school of science. In the face of the fact that the laws of nature are eternal and uncreated—a truth which is universally accepted by all scientists and philosophers of any standing, we can no longer maintain the old view that God is an individual mind, a huge ego-consciousness, a personal being who thinks in syllogisms as we do and arrives at decisions after having taken counsel in his thoughts. If the old anthropotheism alone be the allowable definition of God, the spirit of science must frankly be regarded as atheistic. But is God truly an individual being? We grant that the nature of God must be recognised in his works. God, in a certain sense, must be like his creatures; but certainly he is not like his creatures by being a creature himself, i. e., he can be a concrete, limited being that is only here and not there, that thinks and wills different things at different times. If he were an individual being, he would not be God. If he were concrete, he could not be the allhood, the omnipresence, the universality, the eternity of existence. God has naturally been represented as a man, as a king, as a father; but he is not a human being, not a monarch, not a parent in a literal sense. All these terms are figures of speech, parables, symbols. On the other hand God is not an indefinite generality. He is not concrete, but he is definite. He is that which determines all definiteness in the word. He is the character of the cosmic order with its eternal laws. Thus he is distinct from nature and yet in nature. He is supernatural, because the eternal laws are applicable not only to this actual world, but to any possible world. This view which is the old theism purified of its anthropomorphism, may be called nomotheism, as it identifies God with the eternal and immutable νόμος, the norm of both rationality and existence, of thinking and being, avoids the errors of both the old deism and the old pantheism; it is radical in its admissions to the most radical free thought and at the same time conservative in explaining the significance of the traditional dogmas.

III.

Wool is worn by the common people. The rich, in China, dress in silk.

CHAPTER 71.

I.

Ping (8), "malady," is in this chapter used in two senses which in Chinese almost correspond to a similar use of "sick" in English, but the Chinese mean by "being sick of a thing" being grieved at it, rather than loathing it.

CHAPTER 72.

Wéi (4), "the awe-inspiring," or "the authoritative," is a common term to denote majesty. The commentator Tsiao-Hong (as quoted by Julien) says that wéi, "majesty," and its homophone wéi, "fear," were interchangeably used. Compare also the K'ang-hi on the subject.

CHAPTER 73.

IV.

The character ch'en (19), "slow," "lenient," "patient," is missing in Williams's Syllabic Dictionary. It is found in the Kanghi, Vol. XXVII., p. 22b.

V.

This passage reminds us of the Greek proverb ὀψὲ θεῶν ἀλέουσι υἱοί, ἀλέουσι δὲ λεπτά. (Sextus Empiricus, adv. math., ed. Bekker p. 665.) Friedrich von Logau utilised the idea in a Sinngedicht.

"Gottes Mühlen mahlen langsam, Mahlen aber trefflich klein.
Ob aus Langmuth er sich säumet, Bringt mit Schärff' er alles ein."

Logau's lines were translated by Longfellow :

"Though the mills of God grind slowly
Yet they grind exceeding small.
Though with patience he stands waiting,
With exactness grinds he all."

CHAPTER 74.

Sie Hoeï, in comment on this passage, tells the following incident, which is reported by St. Julien, pp. 276-277 :

"L'empereur Thai-tsou-hoang-ti (fondateur de la dynastie des Ming, qui monta sur le trône en 1368) s'exprime ainsi dans sa préface sur le Tao-te-king : Depuis le commencement de mon règne, je n'avais pas encore appris à connaître la voie (la règle de conduite) des sages rois de l'antiquité. J'interrogeai là-dessus les hommes, et tous prétendirent me la montrer. Un jour que j'essayais de parcourir une multitude de livres, je rencontrai le Tao-te-king. J'en trouvai le style simple et les pensées profondes. Au bout de quelque temps je tombai sur ce passage du texte : 'Lorsque le peuple ne craint pas la mort, comment l'effrayer par la menace de la mort ?'

"A cette époque-là l'empire ne faisait que commencer à se pacifier ; le peuple était obstiné (dans le mal) et les magistrats étaient corrompus. Quoique chaque matin dix hommes fussent exécutés sur la place publique, le soir il y en avait cent autres qui commettaient les mêmes crimes. Cela ne justifiait-il pas la pensée de Lao-tseu ? Dès ce moment je cessai d'infliger la peine capitale ; je me contentai d'emprisonner les coupables et de leur imposer des corvées. En moins d'un an mon cœur fut soulagé. Je reconnus alors que ce livre est la racine parfaite de toutes choses, le maître sublime des rois et le trésor inestimable des peuples!"

I.

Ch'i (19), "extraordinary," "unusual," "innovations," means here revolution.

CHAPTER 76.

III.

Kung (11) means literally "altogether" (W. S. D., p. 464) and may be translated (as the German alle) by "it is gone," "finished," or "doomed." It is difficult to say how Legge can translate the tree "will fill the outstretched arms (and thereby invites the feller)". Did he perhaps read kung, the homophonous compound of radical 32 with kung, "all," which means "to hold or take with both hands" (see W. S. D., p. 463; see also Chapter 62, iv. 3), or did he try to interpret the latter by the former?

CHAPTER 77.

I.

While the first sentence is almost literally like Christ's doctrine, "Whosoever shall exalt himself shall be abased," the second sentence is the reverse of the New Testament teaching, that, "Whoever hath, to him shall be given, and he shall have abundance; but whosoever hath not, from him shall be taken away even that he hath." (Math. 13, 12.)

IV.

Hien (18), "virtue," "talent," "excellence"; taking the next rank to shang, "holiness," or "saintliness" of the sage. See W. S. D., p. 197.

CHAPTER 78.

II.

These remarkable verses are perhaps an echo of the legend of Ti Shun, which are recorded in the Shu-King, Book II. (S. B. of the E., Vol. III., p. 54), where we read: "In the early time of the Ti when he was living by mount Li, he went into the fields and daily cried with tears to compassionate heaven and to his parents, taking to himself all guilt and charging himself with the wickedness"—viz., of all.

Shé ts'ih (11-12) is the official grain-sacrifice annually offered as a Thanksgiving. Shé originally means "the gods of the earth," then the altar of a tutelary god (see W. S. D., p. 748), and ts'ih means "millet," which is one of the commonest cereals in China. (W. S. D., p. 987.)

CHAPTER 79.

I.

Contracts were written on two bamboo slips which fitted together, the left one containing the debit or obligations, the right one containing the credit or dues.

The word ch'eh (31) means now (see W. S. D., p. 42) "penetrating," "perspicacious"; but during the Cho dynasty it meant 'a tithe' or anything that can be taken with the assistance of the bailiff.

CHAPTER 80.

Plaenckner construes shí yiu (5-6), "let there be . . .," rh (12) pu (13), "but . . . not," in the sense "If they had, . . . they would not." He interprets the chapter to mean: "In a small country there are always a few people who, if they had the wealth of princes, would not use it; if they had ships, they would not be able to steer them; if science returned, they would be satisfied with knotted cords. They are satisfied with eating and drinking, etc. . . . Indeed there are neighbors who never take notice of each other, etc." If philological considerations permit this construction, it becomes highly improbable for internal reasons. Herr von Plaenckner translates as he, a child of the nineteenth century, would have Lao-Tze think and write; but he forgets that Lao-Tze had as strong a belief in the pristine innocence and virtuous simplicity of man as our grandfathers had in the story of the Garden of Eden, and believes that the pristine goodness and happiness could have been preserved if but the pristine simplicity of life had been retained.

I.

Shih (7), composed of man and ten, means "a file of ten soldiers"; and shih ch'ang "a corporal," "a decurion." (See W. S. D., p. 768.) In the same way poh (8), composed of man and hundred, means (1) a hundred men, then (2) the leader of a hundred men, or a centurio. (See W. S. D., p. 707.) Stanislas Julien reads in place of poh its homophone pho which is composed of man and white and means "a father's eldest brother," "a senior," "a man of rank," "a chief." Judging from his translation it appears that Strauss adopts the same reading.

The method of writing with knotted cords (chieh shing, 42-43) is very ancient and must have been common to all the races of the world at an early period of civilisation. It is mentioned in Herodotus that the Persian king handed a thong with sixty knots, to be used as a calendar for two months, to the Ionians whom he appointed guardians of a bridge over the Danube. The South Sea Islanders keep their records with the assistance of knotted Pandanus leaves and cocoanut fibres, which also serve the purpose of divination. Ratzel mentions in his History of Mankind, I., p. 199, that chiefs use them for memoranda to assist their memory and wear them round their neck. The same method of writing has been developed among the Peruvians of South America to a considerable extent where such records of knotted cords are called quipu. There are a great number of Peruvian quipu extant, but the key to their significance is lost. We only know that various colors of the threads were employed to denote various tribes, and also various commodities which had to be delivered as tribute. As numbers the knots denoted units or tens according to the position of the cord. Nor can there be any doubt about it that peculiar twists had their special significance.

INDEX

This index, while serviceable for general purposes, is intended to be of special assistance to readers who intend to study the original text. It will be noticed that the Tao-Teh-King is rich in synonyms of Lao-Tze's favorite ideas. There are 6 ways of expressing the idea of life everlasting (see Immortality), 9 for peace of soul (see Rest), 4 for child, 4 for emptiness, 5 for returning or going home, 5 for simplicity, 3 for purity, 3 for form, and 4 for that delicate suppleness which is a symptom of growth and vitality, causing the weak to conquer the strong.

LAO-TZE'S TAO TEH KING

CHINESE-ENGLISH

WITH INTRODUCTION, TRANSLITERATION, AND NOTES

By DR. PAUL CARUS

With a Photogravure Frontispiece of the traditional picture of Lao-Tze, specially drawn for the work by an eminent Japanese artist. Appropriately bound in yellow and blue, with gilt top. 345 pages. Newly bound set with 29 additional pages of Emendations and Comments. Price, $3.00 (15s.).

Contains: (1) A philosophical, biographical, and historical introduction discussing Lao-Tze's system of metaphysics, its evolution, its relation to the philosophy of the world, Lao-Tze's life, and the literary history of his work; (2) Lao-Tze's Tao Teh King in the original Chinese; (3) an English translation; (4) the transliteration of the text, where every Chinese word with its English equivalent is given, with references in each case to a Chinese dictionary; (5) Notes and Comments; (6) Index.

Special Points of Value of the Work.

(1) Considered as a contribution to comparative religion and philosophy Lao-Tze's Tao Teh King is in the eyes of many an atheistical book, for his Deity, the Tao, is not an individual being and is not represented as such, except where avowedly allegorical language is used. But on the other hand there are so many surprising analogies with Christian thought and sentiment in it that we would deem the Tao Teh King written under Christian influence were its authenticity and pre-Christian origin not established beyond the shadow of a doubt. Not only does the term Tao (word, reason) correspond quite closely to the Greek term Logos, but Lao-Tze preaches the ethics of requiting hatred with goodness. He insists on the necessity of becoming like unto a little child, of returning to primitive simplicity and purity, of non-assertion and non-resistance, and promises that the deficient will be made entire, the crooked will be straightened, the empty will be filled, the worn will be renewed, those who have too little will receive, while those who have too much will be bewildered. The Tao Teh King is brief, but it is filled to the brim with suggestive thoughts.

LAO-TZE'S TAO TEH KING.

(2) As a help to the study of Chinese. The book has been so compiled that every reader will have it in his power to verify the translation, and, if so desires, to study the Chinese language practically in connection with celebrated classic. Every Chinese word and its English equivalent is given in the transliteration, which thus forms a complete explanation of the Chinese text, and for every word references are given to the exact page of William's Dictionary, which is the most accessible, and to the K'anghi, which is the most authoritative. There are also notes on pronunciation and methods of transcription. The roots and whole philological history of the words can thus be traced by any reader.

Commendatory Notices.

"I send you by this mail a few slips of a Review of your Lao-Tze. They were published in the N. C. Daily News, the leading Journal in China. I also wrote a brief notice for the Biblical World whence the copy came indirectly. Allow me to congratulate you on your capacity for seeing into mill-stones."—Rev. Arthur H. Smith, American Board of Missions, Tientsin, China.

"It goes without saying that the task of obtaining sufficient acquaintance with the Chinese language to translate, under the conditions named, a book like that of Lao-Tze is a gigantic one. Dr. Carus's success is little short of marvellous. He frequently cites the versions of others, none of which happen to be at hand for comparison, but in the extracts given it seems clear that Dr. Carus has succeeded better than Dr. Legge or Dr. Chalmers in the passages where we are able to compare them,—a very remarkable fact indeed."—North China Daily News.

"Readers will find much to arouse their thought and admiration in its pages."—Jewish Comment, Baltimore, Md.

"I thank you heartily for your kindness in sending me a copy of your fine translation and critical exposition of Lao-Tze's Tao Teh King. It was years ago that I read it. Your publication of the Chinese text will be highly appreciated by all who want to make the study of the philosopher. As I read the text and then the translation, I am astonished how well you kept the original terseness and severe brevity in English. It gives me a certain fascination to read the old philosopher through two such divergent media as Chinese and English."—S. Watasé, University of Chicago.

"Dr. Carus's book is a truly remarkable achievement."—The North China Herald.

LAO-TZE'S TAO TEH KING.

"It is a convenient volume through which to make such acquaintance with the Chinese language and Chinese thought as an American scholar must consider desirable in view of the present increased intercourse with the Oriental world."—Reformed Church Review.

"All that one could do to make the immortal 'canon on reason and virtue' alluring to American readers has certainly been done by the author. The translation is faithful, preserving especially the characteristic terseness and ruggedness of style of the original, the type work is superb, the comments judicious."—The Cumberland Presbyterian.

"Dr. Carus's work as editor, translator, annotator, is most excellent in every feature."—Western Christian Advocate, Cincinnati, O.

"An indispensable book, and no one who is interested in religion can afford to leave it unread."—New York Herald.

"The book is well gotten up, with striking exterior; while of great importance to the serious student, it is usable and interesting to any one who cares at all for the thought and religions of the Orient."—Prof. Frederick Starr, in The New Unity, Chicago.

"Extraordinarily interesting. Of great moment."—The Outlook, N. Y.

"Much labor has been put into this book. It will be a great addition to the knowledge which English readers have of one of the greatest of religious books and religious leaders."—The Church Union, N. Y.

"Nothing like this book exists in Chinese literature; so lofty, so vital, so restful. . . . We have compared this translation with three others—two English, one German—and have no hesitation in saying it is the most satisfactory and serviceable as well as least expensive now accessible to the public. The bright cover of yellow and blue is very appropriate and suggestive of the Celestial Kingdom."—The Hartford Post.

"For the student missionary perhaps the most useful work is Dr. Paul Carus's edition of the Tao Teh King, published last year (1898) by The Open Court Publishing Co., Chicago. Tastefully gotten up, it contains in addition to the full text, a transliteration of the whole, with full grammatical and explanatory notes. The scholarly introductions, with the other special features I have mentioned, and a complete index, make this edition of Lao's work the best that has yet seen the light. The translation is spirited, and in many places reproduces better than in any other the rhythm of the original."—C. Spurgeon Medhurst, in The Chinese Recorder for November, 1899.
